Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has any objection to that amendment. There is a proviso attached to the payment which was made to the State of Massachusetts under the act of 1861. I desire to say a word as to why I wish the opportunity kept open for further proceedings.

The amount named in the bill is that allowed by the Auditor for the War Department and the Comptroller of the Treasury. I am aware that I can not properly expect the committee or the Senate to overrule their accounting of this claim, but I do not think the rulings were just, and I merely desire to keep open the opportunity for review, so that the State need not be shut out from appeal by anything contained in this act.

I ask leave to print, as part of my remarks, a paper prepared by Mr. Dodge, the assistant attorney-general of Massachusetts, who appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and made a very excellent statement in regard to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the statement referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

In re claim of Commonwealth of Massachusetts against United States.

The claim arises under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861, which provides that:

"The Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the governor of any State or his duly authorized agent the costs and expenses properly incurred by such State in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury."

The Comptroller has allowed $1,611,740.85, as appears from the following tabulation:

Interest paid on short-time notes		$25,988.28
Interest paid on first bond issue	$1,722,080.44
Less premium received on sale of bonds	18,261.58
		1,703,818.86
Interest paid on second bond issue	269,517.86
Less premium received on sale of bonds	5,250.00
		264,267.86
Amount paid for engraving plates, printing, and advertising		3,175.52
Cost of premium on gold for payment of principal and interest on second bond issue		93,006.06
		2,090,256.58
Deduct income received by State as offset against interest account		478,515.73
Amount due the State		1,611,740.85

Massachusetts claims to be entitled to an additional sum amounting to $886,389.88, which was admittedly paid as premium on gold bought and used for payment on principal and interest on the first bond issue, corresponding to the item allowed by the Comptroller on the second bond issue.

The first bonds to the amount of $2,217,500 were issued on the authority of Massachusetts acts of 1861, chapter 216, and were all sold before October 31, 1861. The bonds were payable at various dates from July 1, 1871, to July 1, 1876.

Neither the act nor the bonds contained any stipulation as to the kind of money in which the principal and interest should be paid, and there was no general State law on the subject.

The legal-tender act became law on February 25, 1862. It provided that Treasury notes should be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest on public debt.

Immediately after the passage of this act the Massachusetts legislature passed a statute which took effect on March 22, 1862 (chapter 82), and was as follows:

"SECTION 1. The interest and principal of all scrip or bonds of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts which have been, or may be, hereafter issued shall, when due, be paid in gold or silver coin.

"SEC. 2. Whenever the interest or principal of any of the scrip or bonds of the Commonwealth shall become due, the treasurer and receiver-general shall procure coin for the payment of the same, and the governor shall draw his warrant for such sum as may be found necessary to procure such coin, to be paid out of any moneys then in the treasury of the Commonwealth.

"SEC. 3. This act shall take effect upon its passage."

It was under the provisions of this statute that the sum in dispute was paid for gold necessary to meet the interest and principal of the first bond issue. The sum was allowed by the Auditor for the War Department, before whom the claim first came, but was disallowed by the Comptroller on the ground that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Legal-Tender Cases, held that the legal-tender act applied to contracts made before as well as after its passage, and consequently Massachusetts was under no obligation to pay the interest or principal on the first bond issue in gold.

The Comptroller, however, allowed the claim in the case of the bonds, to the amount of $350,000, issued by Massachusetts under the act of April 25, 1862 (chapter 147), on the ground that in the case of these bonds the State had obligated itself to pay in gold.

He had reached a similar conclusion in the case of Pennsylvania, where the bonds were issued under a statute requiring specie payment of interest due from the State.

With regard to the sum now in dispute, the Comptroller asserts that the payment in gold was entirely voluntary, and for this reason can not be made the basis of a claim against the United States. He adds, however: "It is asserted by the State that it was in pursuance of a general understanding that such a law would be passed, and that the principal and interest on these bonds would be paid in coin, that the State was enabled to sell them at a premium when the bonds of the Government were selling at a considerable discount. I have no doubt but that this contention is true, and it is a strong appeal to the equitable powers of Congress, but should and can have no weight with the accounting officers, who are not authorized to allow equitable claims."

The Commonwealth denies the propriety of the deduction of $478,515.73 made by the Comptroller, as shown by the tabulation.

This item is made up of interest received by the Commonwealth on the sums paid on account by the United States at various times and invested by the Commonwealth. These payments were made and the sums invested while the Massachusetts war bonds were outstanding, but as the bonds were not callable before maturity the money could not have been for retiring them.

In other cases where States have been able to use payments received from the United States in redeeming bonds the Comptroller has held that no further charge could be made the United States on account of interest on these bonds.

But where a State has received money from the United States and had no outstanding bonds which she could purchase or redeem the Comptroller has refused to charge the State interest on said money, holding that no duty rested upon the State to invest the money, and though she may have used the money for her own State purposes she could not be charged with interest thereon.

In the Maine case, where moneys received from the United States on account of war debt were applied to the payment of some bonds which had been issued for other than war purposes, the Comptroller held that the United States could not follow the money and claim the benefit of the saving effected by its use.

The Massachusetts case presents a different problem from any heretofore presented to the Comptroller. According to his decisions, if Massachusetts had used the moneys received from the United States in paying current expenses or meeting some other debt the benefit or saving to the State would not have inured to the benefit of the United States; but because Massachusetts happened to choose to invest the money the increment earned by it is to be taken advantage of by the United States.

The Comptroller said: "I think it proper, therefore, as the State is allowed credit for the full amount of interest paid, that where the State received from the United States a payment on the principal of her debt, which payment might have been applicable to the reduction of bonds, had the bonds by their terms been redeemable at that time, the income received from the investment of such moneys should be considered as an offset to the interest charged, the cost to the State being reduced by such amount."

In point of law this seems to be a novel proposition. The money was paid by the United States to Massachusetts unconditionally, and became the absolute property of the State, which could use it as it saw fit and was not obliged to apply it in any way for the benefit of the United States. The fact that the State chose to use it in one way rather than another, and, instead of procuring with it a benefit of some other kind, invested it and derived a pecuniary return upon it, should not affect in any way the amount of Federal indebtedness to Massachusetts.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say a word about the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. GORMAN. So do I.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not quite understand what the Senator's amendment proposes as respects the Court of Claims. I do not understand that there lies an appeal from the Comptroller of the Treasury to the Court of Claims. I should be perfectly willing that the Senator should have an opportunity of having the claim of the State of Massachusetts reviewed by the Comptroller of the Treasury; but I do not think we ought even indirectly to authorize that question to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I will modify the amendment by striking out the words "from prosecuting in the Court of Claims of the United States." That will leave simply the right to appeal for a review by the Comptroller.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator had before stricken out those words. I suggested that to him.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not know any reason why this right of review should be applied to Massachusetts only.

Mr. LODGE. It has been applied to half a dozen other States.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; and it ought to apply to all the States. The State of Maryland is in the same condition precisely in regard to any number of these claims, and if we are to have them reviewed and reopened——

Mr. LODGE. We are merely putting them on the basis that Maryland is on. You have had your bill.

Mr. GORMAN. Are they claims for the war of 1812?

Mr. LODGE. No; for the war of 1861.

Mr. GORMAN. Maryland has quite a number of those claims that have been rejected entirely.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire, Mr. President, to exclude any State. I think all the States ought to have the same opportunity, but there happens to be an appropriation for the payment of this claim to Massachusetts in this bill, and I do not want to have the State cut off by this appropriation from having a review of certain portions of the claim, which I think were unjustly disallowed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest to the Senator from Maryland that he move to insert the words "or any other State" after the word "Massachusetts."

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I am willing to insert "or any other State." All I want to do is to obtain an appeal.

Mr. GORMAN. Referring to that I want to say that, notwithstanding the Senator accepts the amendment inserting the words "or any other State," it does seem to me that we are moving along here very rapidly. This bill contains an immense number of claims that can not be considered, the amounts involved nobody knows, and we are piling all these matters up without any consideration whatever.

If it is permitted by the distinguished Senator who is in charge of this bill, and he is simply accepting the amendments so that they may be disposed of when they come before the committee of conference, that may save the Treasury, but it seems to me that it is the most reckless legislation that I have ever witnessed in the expiring hours even of a Republican Congress. While Senators on the other side in charge of the bill are responsible for the condition of legislation, at the same time it is my duty to say that it does seem to me that it is hardly proper in this pellmell way, without being able to know on what we are voting, to put in the bill claims that are so rapidly presented. I trust that the Senator in charge of the bill will, at all events, give us another day, so that we may consider these amendments as they are presented here.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to say, in regard to the amendment of mine, that it does not add a dollar to the appropriation.

Mr. GORMAN. No.

Mr. LODGE. It simply reserves to the State a right which has been given to the States of Wisconsin and New Jersey, and which has heretofore been given to other States. Such a right should not be given to some States and not to all.

Mr. GORMAN. I admit that is so, and that was the point of my suggestion.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, Massachusetts, to be fair, has had a review of her claims by the Comptroller of the Treasury——

Mr. LODGE. This is the first payment made.

Mr. SPOONER. Here is a case where we have lost our chance to ask for a review by the Auditor for the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to give another day to the consideration of this bill, I want to say that is the very thing I am afraid of having. In that case we do not know what might happen. I think we can manage it if we adjourn to-day and get this bill into conference. I think we can manage it then, and perhaps not bankrupt the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. And save a remnant to the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. And save something for the national debt, the increasing military expenses, and for those things for which we have appropriated. It is too late for the Senator or for me to deliver homilies now upon extravagance. We are in an era of extravagance in almost everything. We pass large appropriations. We shall have another appropriation bill that will come before the Senate, which has very large items upon it that were never put upon a bill of the same kind before. I am afraid of another day, and therefore I ask the Senator from Maryland to join with me in doing the best we can, under these circumstances, to let this bill go on and be completed to-day, and not give it another session.

Mr. GORMAN. Of course, I have not the slightest desire, as the Senator well knows, to delay the consideration of any of these measures. I merely wanted to call his attention to the speed at which we are traveling in these matters. It has been the old rule of this body that we should take sufficient time to ascertain what we are doing, and the amount involved, and the principle at stake in these various suggestions. But if, as the Senator observed, it has reached the point where more time would only result in a greater number of claims, there may be force in his suggestion; and recognizing the care with which the Senator, who will be on the conference committee, always deals with public questions, I have some hope that some one of the propositions which have been put in the bill in this way, without the slightest consideration, will fall about the center of the Rotunda and never will be heard of again.

I hope that the Senator, when he gets into conference, where he can look at these matters in comfort, although it is an unsafe way to legislate, will adopt that course. The Senate ought to deal with and to put on appropriation bills only such propositions as we deem wise and proper and within proper limits with respect to the amount.

As the Senator has suggested, a bill is coming along right after this one. It contains, for an appropriation bill, the most extraordinary proposition. But the great hurry, the desire to get away from the city, will probably prevent us, when we reach it, from giving the bill due consideration. We can only enter our protest against it, and call it to the attention of the Senators who are in charge of these measures; and with that I leave the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. ALDRICH. As modified.

Mr. LODGE. As modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As modified.

Mr. ALDRICH. By putting in "or any other State."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read again as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall debar the State of Massachusetts or any other State——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is enough.

Mr. ALLISON. No; it is not enough.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall debar the State of Massachusetts or any other State from appealing to the Comptroller for review of those portions of their claims under the act of July 27, 1861, which were disallowed by the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Auditor for the War Department.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted as a separate section.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a separate section the following:

That persons in the employ of the Departments at Washington as unclassified laborers may, in the discretion of the proper appointing officer, be treated, as classified, provided they have served two years or more in a clerical or semiclerical capacity, and are specially commended for classification by the chiefs of their respective Bureaus with the approval of the appointing officer, because of their faithfulness and efficiency in the positions occupied by them and because of their qualifications for the positions in which the appointing officers desire their retention.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is general legislation.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not make the point of order on the amendment. I have before me a statement prepared by the acting president of the Civil Service Commission, from which it appears that there are, all told, only 253 clerks or laborers, whichever you see fit to call them, doing clerical work to whom this would apply, and it would not of course apply to any of that limited number except only they have the certificate of the appointing officer as to the fidelity and efficiency with which for more than two years they have performed their duty. It applies to a class of people who are at a very great disadvantage. A person is given a position as laborer and is assigned to clerical duty. Perhaps he gets a salary of four or five or at the outside six hundred dollars and he may be occupying a desk where he ought to be allowed twelve or fourteen hundred dollars salary.

I have before me a great many communications from people who would be the beneficiaries of this legislation if enacted, showing the disadvantage to which they have been subjected, taking the civil-service examination repeatedly, and always without any beneficial result, simply because they are not reached in the order in which they are certified. It seems to me there could not be any harm done to anybody, but only good, if this provision were enacted into law.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Were the persons appointed without regard to their political affiliations?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know how they were appointed. They are people who applied for positions and were appointed as laborers on the roll and who have been assigned to clerical duties. No person can get any benefit from this amendment, except only some one who, having been appointed a laborer, has been assigned to clerical work and is doing clerical work, for which if he had been appointed as a clerk he would get suitable compensation. The effect of it is to substitute two years of satisfactory work at a desk, so certified by the appointing officer, for a civil-service examination; and I think a party who has been two years at a desk rendering satisfactory service ought to be allowed, if the appointing officer gives the necessary certificate, to be put in the classified service where his position is secured to him.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask the Senator one other question before he takes his seat. Is there any provision of law for the assignment of laborers to clerical work?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, there is not. It is absolutely prohibited by law.

Mr. FORAKER. The mysteries of the civil service have always been too much for me.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is prohibited by law.

Mr. FORAKER. But I do know and every other Senator here knows——

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not a fact that the law prohibits the assignment of laborers to clerical work?

Mr. FORAKER. That is possible. I do not know, as I have not taken the trouble to examine it; but I do know that as a fact there are persons, both men and women, appointed as laborers who are carried on the rolls as laborers and who have been assigned to clerical duties. I think the servant is worthy of his hire. I think if persons are required to do clerical work, they ought to be paid accordingly. I think two years of faithful service—and most of them have rendered much longer terms of service than that—when certified to by the appointing officer, is a good equivalent for a civil-service examination, which involves knowledge of the sources of rivers, the heights of mountains, topography, and all that sort of thing.

I think it is an act of justice long deferred, and that the Senate could not do a more worthy thing than to put these people, who have earned it and who will have the certificate from the appointing officer, under the security of the classified service. That is all. It does not increase their salary, except only that they are put into the classified service and are given the benefit of the promotion, which they have earned.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURROWS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 12, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to return by warrant on the books of the Indian Office the sum of $4,573.33 out of the amount of $6,852.82 turned into the Treasury to the credit of the surplus fund, June 30, 1903, under the title of "Indian school, Mount Pleasant, Mich., buildings," being the amount necessary to pay for a building contracted for April 16, 1902, payment for which was properly chargeable against said surplus.

Mr. HALE. That is only a change of appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the amendment a letter from the Secretary of the Interior and a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 22, 1904.

CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter from the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 20th instant, in relation to a deficiency in the appropriation for the erection of certain buildings at the Mount Pleasant Indian School, Michigan, amounting to $4,573.33.

The Acting Commissioner explains that for the fiscal year 1901 Congress appropriated $20,000 for the erection of a girls' dormitory at the above-mentioned school, and that through inadvertence a balance of $6,852.82 went to the surplus fund and was covered into the Treasury June 30, 1903, while it was required to pay indebtedness incurred prior to that date, and he submits an item reappropriating the sum of $4,573.33 of the $6,852.82 erroneously covered into the Treasury to enable him to pay for indebtedness incurred.

The proposed legislation has my approval, and I recommend that the item be inserted into the general deficiency bill now before Congress.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 20, 1904.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: In the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1901 (31 Stats., p. 244) there was appropriated $20,000 for the erection of a girls' dormitory at Mount Pleasant School, Michigan. This dormitory was completed at a total cost of $13,147.18, leaving a balance of the said appropriation of $6,852.82.

Under date of December 21, 1901, this Office requested of the Department authority to advertise for the erection of a brick hospital, brick addition to mess hall, and brick addition to dormitory at the above school, estimated cost for the latter being $5,000, payable from the balance of the $20,000 referred to, the hospital and mess hall to be paid for from amounts appropriated for the fiscal year 1902. Under date of April 10, 1902, this Office advised the Department that all bids for the above buildings were in excess of the appropriation excepting that for the addition to the dormitory, which was within the amount available, the bid being $4,110.88, and a contract was made for that amount.

By the appropriation act for 1903 there was appropriated for this same school $8,000 "for enlarging school buildings." When the claims for the addition to the dormitory were presented by an inadvertence they were charged against the $8,000 instead of the unexpended balance of the $20,000, the amount of which charge for the dormitory was $4,573.33, and the said unexpended balance, $6,852.82, went to the surplus fund June 30, 1903.

Under date of August 28, 1903, a contract was made with J. T. Hidey for an addition to mess hall, $4,895, and an addition to school building, $7,870. It will thus be seen that after having paid for the addition to dormitory out of the school-building fund of $8,000 that fund will be short the amount paid for the addition to the dormitory, or $4,573.33.

As it was clearly the intention of this Office to have used the unexpended balance of the $20,000 to build the addition to the dormitory, I have the honor to request that the Department recommend to Congress that the following be introduced for the purpose of securing the necesary amount to pay for said dormitory:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to return by warrant on the books of the Indian Office the sum of $4,573.33 out of the amount of $6,852.82 turned into the Treasury to the credit of the surplus fund June 30, 1903, under the title of 'Indian school, Mount Pleasant, Mich., buildings,' being the amount necessary to pay for building contracted for April 16, 1902, payment for which was properly chargeable against said surplus."

In view of the fact that this session of Congress is nearing its close, I would respectfully urge that this matter be presented to that body as soon as possible, otherwise the contractor will have to wait until Congress again convenes before the money can be appropriated and paid him.

Very respectfully,

A. C. TONNER, Acting Commissioner.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move to insert on page 50, after line 7, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 50, after line 7, it is proposed to insert:

To defray the expenses of the members of the joint committee of the Senate and the House authorized to attend and represent the Congress of the United States on the occasion of the formal opening ceremonies of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, to be held in St. Louis, Mo., April 30, 1904, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of which sum $2,500 shall be accredited to the Senate to be expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and $3,500 accredited to the account of and expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE. That is a proper amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUARLES. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to be inserted at the end of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment, which is as follows:

That the members of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians, as the same appear upon the official roll of said tribe, made in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, entitled "An act for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians in the State of Wisconsin," and their descendants, who are living and in being on the 1st day of July, 1904, and who have not heretofore received patents for land in their own right, shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be given allotments of land and patents therefor in fee simple, in quantities as follows:

To each head of a family, one-eighth of a section: Provided, That such allotment to the "head of a family" shall be deemed to be a provision for both husband and wife, or the survivor in the event of the death of either.

To each single person not provided for as above, one-sixteenth of a section.

That where a patent has heretofore been issued to the head of a family (a married man) the same shall be deemed to have been in satisfaction of the claims of both husband and wife, and no further allotment shall be made to either of such persons under this act: Provided, That the children of such parents shall be entitled to allotments hereunder in their own right, if enrolled as members of the tribe.

That as there is not sufficient land within the limits of the Stockbridge and Munsee Reservation to make the allotments in the quantities above specified, all available land in said reservation shall be first allotted to the heads of families and single persons residing thereon, until said reservation land shall be exhausted, the additional land that may be required to complete the allotments to be obtained in the manner hereinafter specified: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to carry out the requirements of this act as to making and designating allotments.

That it shall be obligatory upon any member of said tribe who has made a selection of land within the reservation, whether filed with the tribal authorities or otherwise, to accept such selection as an allotment, except that the same shall be allotted in quantity not to exceed that hereinbefore authorized: Provided, That where such selection does not equal in quantity the allotment hereinbefore authorized the allottee may elect to take out of the lands obtained under the provisions of section 6 of this act the additional land needed to complete his or her quota of land, or in lieu thereof shall be entitled to receive the commuted value of said additional land in cash, at the rate of $2 per acre, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated.

That those members of said tribe who have not made selections within the reservation shall be entitled to the option of either taking an allotment under the provisions of this act or of having the same commuted in cash, at the rate of $2 per acre, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated: Provided, That the election of any member to take cash in lieu of land shall be made within sixty days after the date of the approval of this act.

That for the purpose of obtaining the additional land necessary to complete the allotments herein provided for, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to negotiate through an Indian inspector with the Menominee tribe of Indians of Wisconsin for the cession and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the surplus land of the Menominee Reservation in said State, or to negotiate with the authorities of said State, or with any corporation, firm, or individual, for the purchase of said additional land: Provided, however, That in no event shall any agreement of cession or contract of purchase so negotiated stipulate that a sum greater than $2 per acre shall be paid for the land so obtained: And further provided, That no such agreement or contract shall have any force or validity unless the same shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. Or said Secretary may, in his discretion, utilize such unappropriated public lands of the United States as may be required to complete the allotments.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to such members of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe as he shall find entitled thereto under the said act of March 3, 1893, and the enrollment made thereunder, and the descendants who are living and in being on the 1st day of July, 1904, in cash per capita, the whole of the trust fund now to their credit in the Treasury of the United States, when the allotment of lands to them shall have been completed as herein contemplated.

That certain members of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe having made selections of land on tracts patented to the State of Wisconsin under the swamp-land acts, and having made valuable improvements thereon, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause said improvements to be appraised by an inspector or special agent or Indian agent of his Department, and to pay to the owners, as their interests may appear, the appraised value of said improvements, in all not to exceed the sum of $1,000, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated.

That the sum of $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in commuting the value of allotments in cash, in payment for the cession or purchase of additional lands, and in compensating Indians for the appraised value of their improvements located on swamp lands, as provided in sections 4, 5, 6, and 8 of this act.

That all acts and portions of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. HALE. Enough has been read to show that the amendment is subject to a point of order. It is legislation in regard to Indian allotments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to pay to Rittenhouse Moore, out of the unexpended balance of the appropriation made in the act of March 3, 1899, for improving the Potomac River, the sum of $3,653.05, being the amount stated and claimed by him, as set forth in House Document No. 100, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, for overwidth dredging in the Potomac River below Washington, D. C., and recommended by the Secretary of War, as therein shown.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to say that this work was contracted for by the Secretary of War, and the account audited there and referred to the Committee on Claims at the present session, and reported favorably by that committee, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but overlooked in some way.

Mr. HALE. Of course the Chair understands that no estimate, no report of a committee, and no auditing can justify general legislation or make a claim in order.

Mr. PETTUS. This has been audited, and reported favorably by the Committee on Claims, and was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and the work was contracted for by the Secretary of War, and the amendment is recommended by him.

Mr. HALE. Is this a regularly audited claim sent in as such by the Secretary of the Treasury or the auditing officers? If it is not, I make the point of order upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PETTUS. What is the point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it is a private claim.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, the Senate ought to refuse to make fish of one and fowl of another. That is what it has done.

Mr. McCOMAS. I submit the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to repay $14,060.39 paid as duty upon anthracite coal at the port of Baltimore, Md., to the persons who paid the same after the 6th day of October, 1902.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The attention of the Senator from Maine is called to the proposed amendment. It will be read again.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President, I desire, before the point of order is disposed of, to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order was sustained.

Mr. McCOMAS. But if the Chair will hear me and then strike, I should like to be heard for a moment. I do not expect to change the ruling of the Chair, but I desire to say that on page 7, after line 14, the committee has reported a precisely similar case, to refund to Edward King duties erroneously collected.

Mr. HALE. We will strike that out.

Mr. McCOMAS. I do not care to strike it out.

Mr. LODGE. That is a House provision.

Mr. McCOMAS. I wish to say that in the case of the amendment I have offered, the coal duties were paid at the port of Baltimore and the individuals are entitled to receive back their money. It was simply an improper, improvident, and wrong collection by the Treasury. The Secretary so says, and in all the ports of the United States, except three or four, the duties were not exacted after the 6th of October upon such coal.

It is money which the Congress and the Committee on Appropriations should be eager to pay, in order that there may be no inequality in customs in the United States. The first amendment reported by the committee to this bill was to pay for damages to property of Spaniards and French in Spanish waters and on Spanish land as a matter of comity, while here we encounter a point of order on an amendment simply to pay back to people in Baltimore—the individuals—money which was wrongfully taken from them for duties which were not exacted at other ports in the United States, except three. I say before we have comity we should have honesty, and the point of order ought not to have been made against my amendment when similar items are in the bill in my hand, and when a bill for this very purpose has been reported from the Committee on Finance and passed by the Senate and has gone to the House.

Mr. LODGE. Boston is in precisely the same condition.

Mr. McCOMAS. And the Boston people ought to be paid without delay.

Mr. LODGE. I did not expect to get it in at this stage. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

To enable the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia to provide for use in his office twenty Elliott-Fisher book typewriters the said recorder of deeds is hereby authorized to purchase the said twenty Elliott-Fisher book typewriters at an expenditure from the revenues of his office of a sum not exceeding $1,900 and by the exchange of twenty old book typewriters.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk. It has been ascertained and sent in.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

To reimburse the Washington Market Company for furnishing and putting in place 1,072 lockers in the new armory quarters over Center Market for the service of the fiscal year 1898, $2,547.25, and to reimburse the Washington Market Company for extraordinary repairs to quarters vacated by the National Guard of the District of Columbia after being used for armory purposes, for the purpose of the fiscal year 1895, $800.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BARD. I submit the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 90, after line 21, it is proposed to insert:

For the relief of Helen D. Longstreet, widow of Gen. James Longstreet, the sum of $1,250.

Mr. HALE. I might make the point of order on the amendment, but I will not under the circumstances. It is a matter of pure grace.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

Three thousand five hundred dollars by the superintendent of the Indian industrial school at Chemawa (Salem, Oreg.) for transportation and expense of securing Indian youths from Alaska to said school at Chemawa, Oreg., for the current fiscal year is hereby authorized to be paid from the appropriation for transportation of Indian pupils for said year.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order that there is no law for that.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the point of order?

Mr. HALE. That there is no law for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. No law for it?

Mr. HALE. Yes; and no estimate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator withdraw the point of order for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I will for a moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in the Indian appropriaton bill as it came from the Committee on Indian Affairs, there was a provision for the bringing of Indian pupils from Alaska to two schools, the one at Carlisle, Pa., and the other at Chemawa, Oreg., the transportation to be paid out of the general fund for transportation. When the bill went into conference those provisions were both dropped out, and the bill became a law without any provision whatever for bringing Indian youths from Alaska, either to the Carlisle school or to the Chemawa school.

Mr. HALE. I see that an item like this with respect to the Carlisle school is in the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to finish my statement.

Mr. HALE. And I will not make the point of order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to finish my statement, as I desire the House to understand it.

It was stated on the floor of the Senate that it was the policy of the Government not to bring any more Indian youths from Alaska, the provision for bringing them to Carlisle and the provision for Oregon having been taken away. Now I find that in the deficiency bill Carlisle comes in and through some instrumentality gets the provision that was stricken from the proper bill, the Indian appropriation bill, inserted here.

Mr. HALE. This is just as good as that.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator in charge of the bill agrees with me that my proposition is just as good as the other and ought to be inserted.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to express the hope that the Senator will stand by the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I was snuffed out so quickly by my distinguished friend the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that I have hardly yet regained my breath.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator has.

Mr. QUARLES. I intended to appeal to the conscience and sympathy of the Senator from Maine, and I wanted to call his attention and the attention of the Senate for a minute to the proposition that a point of honor is more important than a point of order; that justice and right and equity are above mere matters of procedure. I wanted briefly to state the facts connected with the poor obscure folks in whose interest I introduced this amendment; and if the distinguished Senator had permitted me and the Senate had been kind enough to listen and I had the ability to make the Senate understand the peculiar equities of the case of these poor people, I do not believe that even he, with all the frigid sensibilities which he cultivates when he stands here in his position in charge of a bill, so different from the ordinary genial habit of the man, would have interposed the point of order.

Mr. President, I had intended to appeal to him on the proposition that this great Government can not afford to do wrong to the poor and humble and simple people with whom it deals, and much less to a people who are the wards of the Government. I intended to remind him that in 1856 this Government entered into a solemn treaty with these Indians, whereby it agreed that they should have patents to certain land in fee simple, and since 1856 and up to 1893 these poor people found nothing in their pathway but points of order, which have been like thorns in the way. In 1893, the condition of affairs having changed, this Congress again said that these Indians should have that land which we agreed in the treaty of 1856 they should have, but it provided for an enrollment of the tribe, and in the making of that roll they encountered other points of order all along the line, until from that time till now the solemn promise and faith of this Government pledged to them by treaty and by act of Congress have been trampled under foot.

The Senate has twice passed a bill for these people and has said that they shall have the land for which they have been waiting for half a century. In another place the report of the appropriate committee has said "Yes." Both Houses of Congress have been willing to give them that land, but under a system obtaining in another place, which I have no right to criticise here, the imperious will of one man is interposed and this bill can not be passed.

Mr. President, those poor wretches, after having met points of order at all points, are now turned out of the Senate on another point of order, and they are afraid to die and approach the pearly gate to meet the ineffable light which streams through lest they may encounter there the shade of the Senator from Maine to impale them again on a point of order. [Laughter.] And when they are turned over to purgatory the poor creatures will find no torment so terrible as to think that they were despoiled and deprived of their earthly inheritance by points of order, and then denied admission to paradise in the same way.

Of course I have no right and I shall not attempt to argue this question. I merely want to say to the Senate that it is a shame and an outrage that those poor, defenseless, unprotected, simple people should have been deprived of their rights by this great powerful nation that has assumed to be to them a guardian. I wish to record a protest against it here. I think a point of order on the amendment under all these circumstances is something over which the Senate of the United States has no occasion to feel proud. But, of course, I shall have to bow to the rules of this body. These Indians will have to wait an indefinite period for the redemption of the promises of this Government, which amounts to a lie embalmed first in a treaty and then preserved in an act of Congress which we have proceeded systematically to disregard and disobey.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no request on the part of any Senator, the vote will be taken on concurring in the amendments in gross. The Chair hears none. Will the Senate concur in the amendments?

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following committee to attend the opening of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition: Messrs. TAWNEY, HEMENWAY, LITTAUER, CURTIS, VAN VOORHIS, LOVERING, HERMANN, HEDGE, BABCOCK, LOUDENSLAGER, BARTLETT, MAYNARD, HAMLIN, DINSMORE, and CLAYTON.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6758) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Pending that motion I wish to say that this amendment consists of an addition of $210,600 to the amount appropriated by the House. This increase was made in order to meet legislation of this Congress increasing the pensions of those who are totally blind. The Commissioner of Pensions estimated that it would require $201,600. The Senate have made an amendment to this bill of $210,600.

I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say in reference to this bill.

It is the general pension appropriation bill. I want the RECORD to show the Senate amendment clearly.

The Senate increased the House appropriation by $210,600, and the chairman of the Senate committee, in reporting the bill to the Senate, says:

The committee at this session of Congress has favorably reported Senate bill 671, a bill to increase the pensions of those who have lost both eyes or have become totally blind from causes occurring in the military or naval service of the United States, which, according to a letter received from the Commissioner of Pensions, will require an appropriation of $201,600 to carry the same into effect.

Now, the only increase over the bill as it went from the House to the Senate is this amount. It seems that there is a clerical error of $9,000 between what the Senate committee state they want and what the Senate have appropriated; but a clerical error of $9,000 in a bill carrying $137,000,000 is so small that I do not see any reason why the bill should go back; and I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] that the House should concur in the Senate amendment.

But I wish to state, and to have the RECORD show, that the difference raised by the minority members of the Committee on Appropriations on the pensions item in the general deficiency bill does not occur in this pension appropriation bill. There is no increased appropriation put in the pension appropriation bill for pensions for next year to carry out Order No. 78. Either the management of the House and Senate have determined not to appropriate the money to carry out Order No. 78 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, or they expect, when we come back here next winter, to ask for a deficiency on the general deficiency bill to cover the amount.

But as it is not included in this bill there is no difference between the members of the majority and the minority on the Appropriations Committee. Therefore I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that the House should concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the House conferees may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, and asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The request is that the statement of the House conferees may be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[For conference report and statement see proceedings of Friday, April 22.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, this is a final and complete agreement on the naval appropriation bill. The main items in dispute on the last conference, the House will recollect, were these: First, the matter of appropriations at the Charleston Navy-Yard. The Senate put in items to the amount of $230,000. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars of these have been stricken out in conference, and the House agrees to $50,000 to build a storehouse at that yard. The second important matter in disagreement was that in reference to the consolidation of the heat, light, and power plants in the navy-yards, and the House provision has been agreed to. The amendment relative to rebuilding the Constitution went out in conference. The other important matter relative to the establishment of a training station on the Great Lakes was provided for in this way: The conferees agreed to a provision that the new board, as proposed by the Senate, shall make its report to the President, and the President, upon the approval of that report, shall purchase the site and establish the training station. This proposition is agreeable to all gentlemen who are interested in the sites in their particular localities.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. FOSS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the chairman of the committee explain the difference between the provision as you now agree to it and the proposition as it came from the Senate in the first place?

Mr. FOSS. The difference is this: The Senate amendment provided that the new board should report to the President, who should report to Congress for final action. But this provides that the board shall report to the President, and upon the approval of that report by the President the site shall be purchased and the training station established.

Mr. RIXEY. Does the gentleman think a provision of that kind, taking the matter absolutely out of the power of future control by Congress, is preferable to one which provided that the report should be made to Congress for its action?

I will call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that—as was stated here the other day—there are already two reports upon this question; and if this board had to be appointed, it seems to me the matter ought to have come back to Congress, so that Congress should decide which of these reports to adopt and where the station should be located. I understand the board's report is practically final, and there is no appeal from it. If it has the approval of the President, that is an end of it. Now, it seems to me that is an unwise provision to put into this bill.

Mr. FOSS. I would say to the gentleman that I do not believe that Congress could ever fix upon a site. There are so many localities that are very much interested in this particular thing that I do not believe the House and the Senate could ever locate this training station. The more reports we have will only add to the confusion of the whole subject. If the report should come back here to the next Congress, we would not only have the two reports of the last Congress, but also the new report; and, as I stated the other day, it seemed to me that it would be nothing more nor less than "confusion worse confounded."

Mr. RIXEY. If the gentleman will permit me, he stated the other day that in his opinion the report by the naval officers was well founded and the report ought to be adopted and acted upon. Now, this seems to me to negative that idea and providing for a new report, which we can not now see (we do not know who will make it, shall be final and binding upon Congress without any future action. It seems to me that this is an unwise provision.

Mr. FOSS. I think we can safely leave it to the President of the United States to allow the board to report to him, and then he can establish the station upon approval of the report.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desires to say something, and I know of none, I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FOSS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the conference report be agreed to.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, who is in charge of the merchant marine commission bill, has notified the Chair that he will not call the regular order until the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has an opportunity to ask unanimous consent on four short bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

ENTRY OF AGRICULTURAL LAND WITHIN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 13631.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13631) to provide for the entry of agricultural land within forest reserves.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that bill at the request of one of my colleagues on the Lands Committee and substitute the one the Clerk has.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the bill and asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13633) to regulate the disposal of public lands released and excluded from public forest reservations, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the event of the modification or revocation of any order temporarily withdrawing lands from settlement and entry resulting in the release of such lands from such withdrawal, or, in the event of the exclusion or release of lands from any forest reserve established by the President under section 24 of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," the nonmineral public lands so released from temporary withdrawal or excluded or released from a forest reserve and not otherwise appropriated or reserved shall become subject to settlement from the date of the order or proclamation so releasing or excluding them, but shall not become subject to entry, filing, or selection under any law providing for the disposal of nonmineral public lands until after sixty days' notice by such publication as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, nor shall they become subject to entry, filing, or selection under any law except the homestead laws until ninety days after said notice.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following additional committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the notice herein provided for shall be published at the time of the exclusion or release of such lands from such reservation or withdrawal.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, do I understand unanimous consent is asked for the present consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. This is simply where land is thrown open after withdrawal to prevent somebody filing on it immediately. Parties may find out through the Land Office that the land is liable to be thrown open. This requires sixty days' notice, so as to prevent persons having scrip filing instead of homestead settlers. It gives the homestead settler sixty days' precedence over all other entries.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. Do I understand this pertains to all forest-reserve lands?

Mr. LACEY. It pertains to all forest-reserve land that is thrown open to settlement. When land is thrown open to settlement which has been reserved, either temporarily or permanently, it must have at least sixty days' notice, so that parties can not take it with scrip, and it gives the homesteader preference for sixty days.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to that, but what I do object to is the rule of the Secretary of the Interior, and I assume with the consent of the President, that a temporary reserve should be made at all. I understand this establishes Congressional recognition of that right, and that is the reason I object to it. Heretofore the law did not give the Secretary of the Interior the right to make temporary reserves. It has caused a great deal of trouble in the western country. It looks to me that should be left open to settlement, and this would be Congressional recognition of a right assumed by the Secretary of the Interior that does not exist by law. The President has the right only to make these reservations, and the Secretary of the Interior has four years been assuming the right to make what he called "temporary reserves" when there is no such thing known in the laws of the Government as "temporary reserves." Some of these reserves designated as "temporary reserves" for timber purposes have not a stick of timber on square miles, and it is an assumption I am not willing to stand by here idly and see carried into law.

Mr. LACEY. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I object.

Mr. LACEY. This reserves it for homesteaders——

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PROTECTION OF PUBLIC FOREST RESERVES AND NATIONAL PARKS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 7296.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7296) for the protection of the public forest reserves and national parks of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons employed in the forest reserve and national park service of the United States shall have authority to make arrests for the violation of the laws and regulations relating to the forest reserves and national parks, and any person so arrested shall be taken before the nearest United States commissioner, within whose jurisdiction the reservation or national park is located, for trial; and upon sworn information by any competent person any United States commissioner in the proper jurisdiction shall issue process for the arrest of any person charged with the violation of said laws and regulations; but nothing herein contained shall be construed as preventing the arrest by any officer of the United States, without process, of any person taken in the act of violating said laws and regulations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, with the gentleman's permission, I will ask him one or two questions. I think this is a most admirable provision and something that the Department has long desired to have accomplished. Inasmuch as it refers to forest-reserves legislation, I would ask the gentleman this question: Whether among the bills which he has yet to submit to the House there is any bill which provides for an amendment or the repeal or modification of what is known as the "forest lieu-land bill," which the country has been demanding so long to have either repealed or modified, because of the shameful abuses practiced under that provision of law?

Mr. LACEY. I will state to the gentleman that I have but one more bill which I expect to call up this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF COAL-LAND LAWS IN ALASKA.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2814) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the coal-land laws to the district of Alaska," approved June 6, 1900, and in that connection I ask unanimous consent to have the House substitute read instead of the Senate bill, which I shall send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person or association of persons qualified to make entry under the coal-land laws of the United States who shall have opened and improved a coal mine, or coal mines, on the unsurveyed public lands in the district of Alaska, and who may desire to enter and purchase the same, according to the provisions of the said coal-land laws, before the extension of the public-land surveys over the lands on which such mines are located, shall file in the proper land office an application to enter the lands held and claimed by them, together with a plat and field notes of a survey of the same made under the direction of the surveyor-general of the district of Alaska, showing the boundaries of said tracts and their location as regards permanent natural landmarks, or other surveys. All tracts shall be rectangular in form, containing 40, 80, or 160 acres, and distinctly marked by monuments on the ground, and the boundaries of the same shall be true east and west and north and south lines as nearly as practicable. Upon presentation of said plat and field notes the application, if otherwise regular, shall be accepted as though the tract sought to be entered were embraced within the regular public-land surveys.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make all necessary rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] again to kindly answer the question I previously submitted to him, although it is not relevant to this particular bill which has just been passed.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN] that objection has been made to taking up the lieu-lands bill, to which he refers, by unanimous consent, and therefore I have not asked it.

DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7056) creating a commission to consider and recommend legislation for the development of the American merchant marine, and for other purposes; and I think it is proper for me to say now that at the close of the time agreed upon by the two sides of the House I shall ask for a vote this afternoon, and shall yield to nothing except those things that the rules of the House compel me to do. I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN] in an elaborate speech, evidently carefully prepared, arraigned the President of the United States in terms that seemed to me were exceedingly objectionable. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN] is a Member of the House of Representatives, a part of one of the coordinate branches of the Government of the greatest of Republics. That gentleman, it seems to me, owes a duty to the people of the United States, owes a duty to this great Republic to uphold, so far as may be, its honor, its integrity, its high standing among the nations of the earth, and yet we were compelled yesterday to listen to the terms that he applied to the Chief Executive of this nation, to the bitter, ah, criminal denunciation of the Executive of the greatest of nations.

The influence of that gentleman was exerted yesterday, so far as he could exert influence, to degrade, through the Chief Executive of the nation, the whole Republic; to destroy, so far as he could, its standing, its influence, its power among the world powers of the earth. The gentleman made use of a phrase—a quotation, perhaps—from one of the numerous volumes that have come from the pen of Theodore Roosevelt as a justification of his remarks, viz, the statement that there is a strain of barbarism running through the people of the South. This gentleman is a representative of the people of the South. I call up the speech he made yesterday as a witness justifying the statement alleged to have been made by the President. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, this country has been agitated many times by the presence of a disloyal spirit in all parts of the country, I will admit—a spirit that in instances has taken the law into its own hands, and, refusing obedience and respect for the courts, has attempted to execute its own judgment, the judgment of the mob, upon citizens entitled to the protection of the laws; a deplorable condition, rampant in one section of the country, frequent in the appearance of its outrages in one section of the country, occasionally to be found in all, illustrating, perhaps, the truth of the statement alleged to have been made by the President, that there is a strain of barbarism running through all the people, North as well as South.

But the gentleman sought to place the responsibility for this barbaric spirit upon the President of the United States, arraigning him as one who was the advocate of lynching and the justifier of the horrid outrages that have been perpetrated in the section from which the gentleman came. Think of the situation of those people and of those outrages described by the President—those of which all good men complain. The President spoke of the extreme frontier, a sparsely settled region, a region occupied almost exclusively by men, where the tempering, the civilizing influence of women is not known. But on the frontier, in the absence of the machinery of law, where there was no way by which its majesty could assert itself, people, taking the law into their own hands, upon rare occasions attempted to secure that peace and quiet of society essential to all.

And for that, because of that condition—losing sight, rather, of that condition—the gentleman assumes that in other portions of the country, where the courts are, where the officers of the courts are, where the law places its protection upon all men and visits its vengeance upon those who refuse obedience to its behests—he tells us that the one instance is the justification for this larger and more gross and terrible outrage that is perpetrated so frequently in the section from which the gentleman comes.

Mr. Speaker, I thought that this much ought to be said upon this question—that the brutal arraignment of the President of the United States ought not to go unchallenged, but that some one, in addition to my friend here [Mr. GROSVENOR], ought to say what I have said.

The gentleman seemed to make merry over the fact that the President of the United States apparently at some period of his life has not seen fit to allow the gentleman from Ohio and myself to find favor in his eyes. He discussed the subject of civil service and discussed, I am told, the gentleman from Ohio and myself. Apparently the President of the United States has views upon the subject of the civil service. I am glad to say they differ from mine; and if he has as poor an opinion of my views on that subject as I have of his I am ready to commiserate him or to be commiserated by him. [Laughter.]

But there is this to be said—that the President of the United States does not allow his opinions upon questions of this kind to interfere with his relations with the public servants. He recognizes their rights; he recognizes their proper influence, notwithstanding the fact that upon some topics of government he may differ from them.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, during my absence (and I am not complaining of it, for the gentleman to whom I am about to refer was most courteous to me—he wrote a note to me stating that it was his purpose to engage in discussion that I might be interested in) the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] made some remarks that perhaps are entitled to my attention. On that occasion, as on all other occasions, the gentleman has manifested kindliness to me and has indulged in complimentary statements, for which I make my most profound acknowledgments.

During the course of his remarks he took me to task with some severity for some error that he alleged I had made with reference to the quantity of pig iron produced in the United States. The gentleman was right; I was not. I made the error of taking as authority, and not scanning it with sufficient closeness, a floating newspaper statement.

I wrote to the man most informed on all subjects relating to the production of iron and steel in the United States—Mr. Swank—telling him of the statement I had made, of the source from which I thought I had derived it, and asking if he could point me to the item. He replied no, that he had never seen it, but that he had prepared a statement of the world's production that harmonized with the one that I had made. My error was in not looking with that closeness that I should have used, and I mistook for the production of the United States the entire production of the world. The gentleman was right; I was wrong.

But I am a fallible mortal; and in that respect I am like many other people. I might perhaps be excused for making a mistake in regard to pig iron. I never produced any; I never ate any. [Laughter.] I had but little familiarity with it except that derived from books. But that fallibility on my part is not an exception; there are other instances of the same kind, allow me to suggest.

The gentleman comes from Missouri, one of the great corn States of the United States, one of the proudest of them all, and one to challenge the pride of all its citizens. He lives in the very center of that part of Missouri that has been the most blessed of God, for I assume that when God saw fit to shower his choicest blessings to mark, as He marks no other part of the earth, that part that He most approves, He puts his seal of approbation upon the great corn belt of the world, which is located so that the home of the gentleman is in the very center of that blessed region. One would suppose that the gentleman would be familiar with the subject of corn. He has raised a great deal of corn. He has consumed a great deal of corn, some of which he has eaten. [Laughter.] And if there is any topic in the world that he ought to be absolutely familiar with, it is the subject of corn. I only allude to this to show that the gentleman from Missouri is fallible, as well as the gentleman from Iowa.

He stated that in 1902, the last year in which he had access to the records, this great corn belt of the world produced 1,522,000,000 bushels. In 1902, that year, the records tell us this same corn belt produced 2,523,000,000 bushels. The gentleman's error was only one of a billion and a million of bushels. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I gave the production for both years.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. And you are attributing to me the statement of one year, when the statement was for the other.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, now, let us see. I would not be willing to do an injustice to the gentleman. I read from the RECORD:

> How much corn is imported into the United States?
> In 1902, the last year for which I have the figures, we produced 1,522,000,000 bushels and exported 28,000,000 bushels.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the gentleman in making this statement with regard to the production of corn was to emphasize what he meant to be an acknowledgment from me that there was no protection in the State of Iowa for the great cereals of that State. I stated that I lived in a county in which there was no protected industry. That was my language, attempting to differentiate, as the subsequent statement showed that I did, between the industries as applied to manufactures, and the agricultural interests of the country.

I think no gentleman in this House misunderstood me except my usually acute friend from the State of Missouri. Therefore he says that the people of my State have no protection at all for their industries, and he cites the small amount of corn that the Iowa and Missouri producer comes in competition with at the custom-houses. The gentleman is correct. We have now no need of protection for corn in the State of Iowa. That is true, and the gentleman tells us that we have thrown this, a seeming protection, as a sop to the farmer, and he arraigns the Republican party as being guilty of a crime. Does not the gentleman know that the Wilson bill contains substantially the same provision, and that whatever "sop" the Republican party has thrown for the purpose of deluding the farmers of the country our brethren of Democratic persuasion were guilty of—substantially the same, their rates being a little higher? Of course they could not deceive them as the Republican party might, for there are few in this land who have memories and intelligence who can be deceived by the statement of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Republican side.] But the gentleman neglected to speak of another branch where his State and mine feel the beneficent influences of the protective tariff.

In one of the recent years the farmers of this country produced butter, cheese, poultry, and eggs to the amount of $7,753,000,000 in value. Think of that! And while it is true that Canada, lying above the forty-ninth parallel, can not produce corn harmful to our interests, Canada can produce and is our chief competitor, or would be, in these other items of stupendous worth and value to us.

The gentleman failed to say anything about that. The gentleman was simply upon the subject of corn, and I hold corn as responsible for his lapse of thought. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] takes me to task because inferentially, perhaps directly, I spoke of the first importation of Bessemer steel as under the Walker administration. Of course that was not correct.

A moment's thought would have taught me, as it did the gentleman, that this was an error, although I have sometimes wondered how he discovered that these statements of mine were mistakes. But he would have known, if he had thought, possibly, that any man of intelligence must know something about the history of Bessemer steel. But the point that I was trying to illustrate was absolutely correct. I spoke of steel at a period when I should have said iron, because iron at that time was the only railroad bar that we had. I said when the first introduction of steel was made into the United States it was worth $165 a ton. Now, at that time iron was worth $80 a ton, and every man knows—certainly the gentleman from Missouri knows—that in use the life of a steel rail is more than three times greater than that of an iron rail.

So, for the purpose of my argument, I would have had a right to say that, as compared with the utility of a steel rail now, we were then paying $240 a ton for steel rails at the time when the first steel rail was introduced. My purpose was to show that under the influence of a protective tariff the high rate enforced upon the country by Democratic theories had been constantly reduced. That was my argument. I was sustained by the record—that is the proof as to that—and none of you dare to combat it——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me finish my sentence. On all of those articles that have been protected and that we have been engaged in the successful manufacture of, all, however under the protection given by the protective principles of the Republican party, prices have been reduced infinitely to the consumer. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman to give a candid, fair answer to this question: If steel rails and steel——

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I do not intend to have any interjection of that kind in my speech. If you have a simple question, I will answer it.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I have a simple question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would say to the gentleman from Missouri that I do not intend to answer it. I do not intend to have any part of your speech injected into mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. It would better it. It would improve your speech a good deal. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I have no doubt it would improve it a good deal. But now, Mr. Speaker, if I could model myself upon the gentleman, I could improve all of my speeches. I would make them in at least four languages. Look at the learning found in the gentleman's speeches—quotations from the Greek, quotations from the French, quotations from the Latin. The gentleman knows glibly the quotations. I do not know how familiar he is with the tongue. [Laughter.] But I know this, that if I could take him as my model I would go into the regions where Tacitus went. "I would roam," as the fellow from Wisconsin said, "I would roam with old Romulus [laughter]; I would cant with old Cantharides; I would rip with old Euripides [laughter]; but what in the hell has that to do with the laws of Wisconsin." [Loud and prolonged laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. As you are not familiar with the languages, I want to ask you a question in plain American, which you can answer in the same way.

Mr. HEPBURN. If it is not part of your speech.

Mr. CLARK. It is entirely pertinent to your speech. If the price of steel rails and steel products has gone down all over the world, England included, at the same rate that they have gone down in the United States, then did the tariff of the United States have anything to do with the fall of the price? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I am glad to be able indisputably to answer my friend from Missouri. There has been a fall in the prices all over the world. But why? Is it not a well-known fact that permanent protection begets a certainty of construction, that it begets cheapness of method, that it begets lower prices, and under the glorious, stupendous competition brought here in the United States by the beneficent protective tariff law its influence has spread throughout our confines and to-day extends from shore to shore? Throughout the land, wherever there is a forge or a furnace or a rolling mill, there is competition. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] It is so in regard to steel, it is so with regard to all the other protected products.

The trouble is that with the Democratic tariff and their refusal to give this protection these industries would not arise. There would have been no competition. We would have been at the mercy of the foreign producer, and the reduced price to us would be dependent upon the pleasure and the interests of men that neither our legislation nor our society could control. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, before I leave this question of Bessemer steel, I want to correct the gentleman a little bit further. He is too modest by half. He spoke most kindly of an ancestor of mine, one of whose eventful career I am proud, save one thing. That old gentleman was a Jefferson Republican, and by his vote contributed to the election of Thomas Jefferson instead of Aaron Burr.

Mr. SHERMAN. You say "Jefferson Republican."

Mr. HEPBURN. They made that distinction before us yesterday, and the gentleman from Kentucky almost wanted to have it understood that the Republican party of 1803 was the Republican party of 1904. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I just want to say to the gentleman that I do not think what I said was very material.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will withdraw that and get rid of it in the easiest way.

I want to suggest that that ancestor of mine built the first furnace where the first Bessemer process, so called, was used in Eddyville, Ky., in 1847, the gentleman's native State. His successor in the ownership of that iron establishment produced the first Bessemer steel or used the first processes ever known to mankind. Henry Bessemer has given his name to this commodity that now circles the world. His name is in the mouths of more men than that of any other man living to-day, but yet he never made an ounce of Bessemer steel in all of his life until he used the processes of other men, which made his imperfect and entirely inadequate one sufficient. The patent for producing Bessemer steel was given to Mr. Kelly, of Eddyville, Ky., in 1856.

Mr. Speaker, the discussions that we have heard here upon the tariff question from the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, from the gentleman from Mississippi, from all of the other States nearly, have settled one question beyond peradventure, and that is that the money question is now settled. As the Republican party have fixed it so it is to be. Is not that true, gentlemen? Do you not all agree to that; the money question is a settled one?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. HILL of Connecticut said not, as I notice in the papers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, what do you say?

Mr. MADDOX. I say not.

Mr. HEPBURN. You say not, and yet you sit here and listen to these men discuss the tariff question; you a Democrat. Where are the pledges of your party, how obligatory are they upon you? How do they bind your conscience and your acts, if you will sit here day after day and hear them discuss this tariff question before the money question is settled? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. God Almighty has settled the money question.

Mr. MADDOX. I listened to you as I listened to them. Neither you nor they bind my conscience.

Mr. HEPBURN. But it is your duty to rebuke. When a man's party is assailed, when his platform is assailed, when it is disregarded, when it is trampled under foot by the leaders, it is your duty as a Democrat to rise in your place and rebuke the wanton desecration of the party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MADDOX. I will try to do it now——

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, you are not——

Mr. MADDOX. If the gentleman will yield, I will undertake to discuss what is my duty; it is not under the gentleman's charge.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I am going to yield in an hour. Here is what you say:

Until the money question is settled we are opposed to any agitation for further changes in the tariff laws.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

What do you gentlemen mean by this agitation for changes in the tariff laws without you are prepared to confess that the money question is settled—the paramount issue?

Mr. BOWIE. What platform is that?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the Democratic platform.

Mr. BOWIE. What year?

Mr. HEPBURN. 1896.

Mr. BOWIE. That was the Wilson tariff platform, the Wilson bill we did not want to change, not the McKinley bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; but you were not in favor of any changes.

Until the money question is settled we are opposed to any agitation for further changes in the tariff laws.

Will another gentleman speak? [Applause on the Republican side.] Now we can draw some little comfort from this prolonged discussion. Oh, how weary we have grown under the iteration and reiteration of the threadbare Democratic theories—theories shown to be impolitic; theories shown to be unwise. It has been wearisome, indeed, but here is the consolation. We now know that in one matter, at least, you acquiesce in that which we have done and concede that final settlement has been given to that question which a little while ago was rocking the foundations of the Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri the other day took me to task for speaking of that period of seventy-two years of the history of this Government antecedent to 1860 as a Democratic period. He misunderstood me. I said that it was a period when Democratic theories upon the subject of the tariff were paramount. That is what I said; that is what I stand by. Oh, I remember that George Washington was President of the United States during that period. I remember that John Adams was.

I know it full well, but during all of that period, during all of those years, there was never a protective tariff or a tariff of any value whatever for protection, except that the second act passed under the Constitution, written by Alexander Hamilton, immortal Alexander Hamilton, Alexander Hamilton, to whom this nation owes more, under God, than any intelligence that God ever created [applause on the Republican side], had inserted in its title the fact that the act was for the purposes of protection, securing from the infant Government in the first days of its life, in those throes that then beset it, the broad declaration that it was within the power and within the duty of the young Republic to protect the labor of the Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I remember that we had, too, for short periods—very short; alas, too short—a protective tariff, so called, in 1816, in 1824, in 1828, and in 1842, but they were at all times the subject and object of vituperative assault by the Democratic party. They were permitted to live but for a few months at a time, not sufficient to produce any result of any character beneficial to the labor of the country. A man before he will invest his hundreds of thousands or his millions of dollars in the great establishments necessary to carry on cheaply and efficiently the great work of protection must know that there is to be stability of conditions, must know that he is to have years rather than days in which to work out his great enterprise and to make the later years compensatory for the losses of the earlier ones.

No such time existed; and so it was that at the end of the seventy-two-year period all of the productions from manufactories amounted in value to but a billion and three-quarters of a million of dollars, and they largely the spinning wheel, the loom at home, and the humble small cards, the blacksmith shop at the crossroads. There were no colossal establishments; there were no establishments like Carnegie's, like the Bethlehem works, like the great cotton mills that even now, thank God, we have in the South—nothing of that kind. There was no fostering, because the heel of a relentless Democratic party, carrying out a theory, had refused that the laws should live and that the enterprises should grow. After all, Mr. Speaker, see how the gentleman skirmished around the great proposition that I tried to bring to his attention.

I was contrasting two periods—two periods controlled by different theories—the period of seventy-two years up to 1860, where Democratic theories held sway upon the question of protection, and the other forty two or three years where a different policy, a policy of protection, prevailed. That is what I was trying to do, and the gentleman did not attempt to disturb in any way the contrast that I presented through the comparisons that I made. I called attention to the wealth of the country at the end of the first period, sixteen billions; at the end of the second period, eighty-six billions; to the circulation at the end of the first period, four hundred and seven millions; at the end of the last period, nearly twenty-nine hundred millions; to the manufactures at the end of the first period, one and three-quarter billions; at the end of the last period, thirteen billion dollars.

I called his attention to the loss to the country during the first period, where its wealth had gone out to meet the bills of foreign manufactories for the necessaries of life that they sent to us, $1,120,000,000, which was the balance that we shipped out of the country in order to pay for that which we bought abroad and which we ought to have made. I contrasted that with the $3,400,000,000 of balances in our favor, where the wealth of the world came to us, where we had gathered of their precious metals and of their portable wealth the stupendous sum of nearly three and one-half billions of dollars in the short space that intervened since we enacted the Dingley law here in the spring of 1897. That is what I was trying to do. Ah, how gingerly my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] treated that!

If there was any climax or anything akin to that which pertained to my speech, it was that which I was trying to bring to his attention and to the attention of the American people, so that they might through these object lessons, through this arrayment of facts, through these colossal blessings that have come to us in later years, make comparison between the two theories as I have made comparisons between the results of the two theories. [Applause on the Republican side.] And how did the gentleman dispose of it? If he had said nothing, I might have thought that it entirely escaped his attention; that, busy with his own changing views upon the tariff question, he had entirely neglected to think of what any other man's views were; but he blandly disposed of the subject by asking if I did not think that sunshine and gentle shower and fertility of earth had something to do with this later great production that I had called attention to.

Ah, yes, yes; all Republicans bow humbly in an obeisance to the great God that sends us the sunshine and the gentle shower and gives us the fertile soil. We are ready to do that. But did the gentleman mean to imply that during that other period that God—God omniscient, all powerful, knowing even what the Democratic party was doing—would be unwilling to send His benediction upon a country ruled by that party, and withhold the sunshine and the gentle shower and the fertility of soil during the first period that I spoke of? [Prolonged applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I am glad now to be able to bring some kindly intelligence to the gentleman—something that I know he will appreciate. He was agonizing in some portions of his speech because of the want of harmony in the Republican party. He thought that he saw the shadow of Republican discord. Ah, how it wrung his heart! He has been taught that all brethren should dwell together in unity and love; and to see this shadow and to hear occasionally a discordant note coming from across the Mississippi River and upon its northern border filled his heart with anguish. But I am able to tell him now that harmony reigns. I am able to tell him now that in the county conventions of the State of Iowa "the Iowa idea" is put to rest. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Republicans have asserted themselves, and have asserted themselves in harmony with the doctrines of the party and in harmony with the doctrines of the lamented McKinley.

Oh, "the lamented McKinley!" How the gentlemen on the other side phrased with tenderness that sentence—he upon whose devoted head all the vials of their wrath, vituperation, vilification, foul abuse, and fouler slander had been hurled until the very hour of his lamented death. If there is any one thing that in my mind calls for the indignant rebuke of Republicans, it is the insolent claim that McKinley and Lincoln, the men most abused, the men most vilified, the men most slandered, were in complete harmony with the Democratic party, and that they are ready to take them into the galaxy of their sainthood. Bah! It is contemptible on the part of men who have pursued this persistent course, the course of malevolence, to whine and snivel at the tomb of those who for a lifetime they have vituperated. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party of Iowa stands by the platforms. Ah, they stand by the sentiments of the last speech that was ever uttered by the last of its martyrs. And they rebuke the efforts of Democracy, by forgery, by partial readings, by the omission of qualifying and controlling sentences, to torture that speech into a pretense of support for their theories.

Mr. McKinley never uttered a word—never a word in that speech or any other—varying from his constant insistence that all changes in the tariff or enactments in the tariff should keep in mind at all times Republican principles and should be written with complete regard to the protection of the industries and the labor of the country. [Applause.] You can here and there pick out a sentence, cut it in two, perhaps, leaving off a qualifying or controlling clause, and in that way may be able, by the forger's tricks, to secure some countenance in his declarations for your theories.

But what of harmony in the Democratic party? What are you doing? What dare you say except the simplest, simpering platitudes? Here we have an illustration: A great convention, the greatest of the Democracy in the records of this year, has been held, great because it was expected that it would launch a Presidential candidate. What is there in that declaration of so-called "principles" that might not have been written on any day that any so-called "Democratic convention" ever assembled in the United States? [Applause on the Republican side.] And then if at that time there happened to be a living, burning question, how would the people have known whether you were voting it up or voting it down?

Think of the attitude of the Democratic party to-day! Here came a young gentleman out of the West, from California. He regarded himself, and many of his people regarded him, as a fit candidate for the Presidency of the United States. He moved over the troubled Democratic waters. He gave quiet and peace here and there, and he gathered about himself a vast following. And it at once became apparent that unless something should be done, and that quickly, this young man, HEARST, who was not in favor here with the Democratic leader of this body—he was not in favor, perhaps, with more than two-thirds of the Democrats of this House; he was not in favor with many of the Senators—that this man would be nominated if something were not done.

And so the men who said, "None but Cleveland," the men who said "None but Gorman," the men who said "None but Olney," all rushed together in conference, and scratching their ranks as with a fine-tooth comb, they finally discovered a man who, perhaps, had never uttered a political sentiment, who had perhaps, voted the Democratic ticket, who was a friend of Mr. Cleveland, who is understood to have voted for Mr. Bryan, and who had the friendship of the one and on the other side the advantage of regularity. At once they said, "This is our man." Ah! If the Sphinx had been here, if he could have changed his habitat from Cairo to New York, he would have been of all gentlemen the most acceptable. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

He not only never has said any fool things, but he could give guaranties for the future [laughter]; but they could not get him, so in New York they accepted their next best but not inferior man, and they are now engaged in putting him forward. Why? Ah, when the masses of the Republican party will name by acclamation Theodore Roosevelt [prolonged applause on the Republican side], it will be because they know him. It will be because they know his sentiments, and approve them; because they know his integrity, and approve it; because they know his intelligence and wisdom, and indorse them. What will you do?

Mr. BENNY. Beat him. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, probably you will! You always do until the votes are counted [laughter and applause on the Republican side], and if you had your methods of the South and had the counting of the votes, of course you would beat him; we know that.

Mr. CLAYTON. How about Philadelphia?

Mr. HEPBURN. We are going to nominate a man upon a platform that declares for things, for principles, for ideas, no mere aggregation of glittering generalities.

Mr. CLAYTON. He has already nominated himself.

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, the other parrot said that. [Laughter.] What will you do upon the tariff question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be granted such time as he desires to conclude his remarks.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Second the motion. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended to complete his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thank you, gentlemen. What will be your views upon the tariff question? Will you adopt the views of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]? A little while ago he said:

I would destroy every custom-house in America. If I had my way, sir, I would tear them all down, from turret to foundation stones.

Again he says:

I am a free trader, root and branch.

That is all of him. [Laughter.] That is what he would do. Will that be the view of the convention? Is that Missouri's sentiment? Missouri is one of the great States, colossal nowadays, important in Democratic councils. It has a little ruction of its own, I am told—a little one. It is being put in the doubtful column. I saw a Democratic newspaper the other day that said there were only fifteen States that you could count upon with certainty, and Missouri was excluded from the list. You will have to be careful, gentlemen, about the tariff. There are some Democrats in that State who will not want competition from Canada in their butter, their eggs, their cheese, their poultry. There are some farmers there who will not want competition from Canada or from Mexico in their beeves.

What will you say? Will you adopt the gentleman's theory and tear down all of these fine structures of ours, or will you hedge a little? I am inclined to think that you mean to hedge, for the gentleman from Missouri has started off on full trot for a complete hedging.

One of the most remarkable things in that very remarkable speech of my friend was the indorsement that he gave to a magazine article upon the tariff, written by the Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS. He seems to have surrendered himself almost bodily—mentally, at least, all of his convictions, or that which he calls his convictions—to the gentleman from Mississippi. That gentleman said:

Perhaps it might be said that an ideal Democratic "tariff for revenue only" would consist in levying import duties upon all or nearly all imports—

How indefinite that is. There is room to go to each fellow and tell him, "Why, we are not going to take away the protection from yours. Don't you see? I have fixed that adroitly. I have said 'all, or nearly all.'" It is nicely arranged. It is not a Democratic ambiguity, is it, gentlemen? Is not that certain, positive, clear? Oh, yes. That would have done in the New York platform. But the gentleman from Mississippi said more—dividing them, however, into three classes: First, necessaries of life and necessaries of industries; second, comforts, and third, luxuries.

Necessaries of life and necessaries of industries! If these are to be exempted—the necessaries of life and the necessaries of industries, they constituting one class—that means free wool; that means free ore, does it not? That means free everything that enters into the manufacture of an article in the United States. Is that Democracy of to-day? But the gentleman goes on further. In the magazine article he continues:

The general principle that protectionism is wrong, morally wrong—a prostitution of government to private ends—should never be forgotten; the goal ought not to be lost sight of. At the same time friends of tariff reform would not strike down in a revolutionary way—"overnight," as the Germans say—all the scaffolding which the false system has erected. * * *

Ah, they are going to dally with this great wrong, this moral wrong, so abhorrent to the tender conscience of the tender Democrats. Morally wrong, inherently wrong, every day wrong, that is to be kept constantly in mind, never to be forgotten; its goal is always to be in sight; and yet they are now dallying with it. They will not effect the remedy in a revolutionary way. Oh, no. They are through with revolutions. They have had their experience. They do not want to do it in a revolutionary way. They are not going to do it overnight. Oh, no. We have been promised, gentlemen, that this thing of striking down protection is not to be committed in the night.

When they do it they are going to have the courage to do it in the open day; but they are not going to do it at once. But they are going to dally with it a little while. But they say further that they can not have free trade here, because of a decision of the Supreme Court in the income-tax case. But for that they would have free trade. But the Supreme Court has injected its decision adverse to the income tax, and they have got to have revenue, and therefore they can not have their cherished object. They can not accomplish the act—this wrong—they can not commit this gigantic wrong just yet. So they are going to have "a tariff for revenue, to carry on a government economically and effectively administered." This becomes the American tariff reformer's goal. "It must be kept in mind until it is reached, but it must be reached by the exercise of wisdom and good sense."

Gentlemen, there is a promise that the Republican party is to be called in to aid in this great work. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The tariff reformer who would do things recklessly or too suddenly would run the risk of destroying the very end which he had in contemplation by furnishing object lessons—

Listen to that, gentlemen—

object lessons which would not help him, but would hurt him, and in consequence of which he and those of his opinion might be hurled out of place and deprived of the power of doing anything.

Oh, yes; here is an acknowledgment that if the Democratic party dared to do at once what they contemplate doing, what they think they will do, what they all say now if they were to do so that the people could see at once the enormity of their action, the wrongs they were inflicting, they would be hurled from power and would not be permitted to do anything.

Ah, gentlemen, that is prophetic. The people do not, in my humble judgment, intend to hurl you from power. Oh, no, no. Satan was never banished but once, I think. [Laughter.] That excommunication can not be repeated until he gets into power. There is a wonderful wilderness of weary and wearying ways before you reach that point where you will be in power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But the gentleman tells us that he is still theoretically, academically, a free trader. Practically, a little while ago he was the most practical of free traders. Three years ago, I think it was, maybe four, he was then simply not theoretically a free trader, but an active, practical one. He was not willing to walk in the groves of the academy and discuss free trade as a theory.

Ah, no! He was a practical man, an active man. He wanted to go to work and tear down the customs-houses, in his classic language, from turret to foundation stone. That is what he wanted then. But now he says, "Theoretically I am a free trader, but when we need revenue then I am in favor of tariff." Oh, yes, in prosperous times he is in favor of free trade, but when the storm comes, when the stress of weather arrives, when the clouds are lowering, when the banking institutions are going to pieces, when trade languishes, when the hum of industry everywhere is stilled—ah, yes, when calamity comes, then he reaches out for Republican aid and Republican methods; then he exclaims: "We must have a protective tariff, or at least we must have that tariff that will raise revenue."

I perhaps ought not to have said that the gentleman was in favor of "protective tariff." He said "that tariff that would raise revenue;" and I make that correction. But I want to impress upon the Republicans this: That there is no such thing as an incidental protective tariff for revenue. It can not be. That tariff that is wisely drawn for the purposes of revenue fixes the rate, the highest rate, that will not impede the inflow of imports. That tariff for revenue that raises the most revenue and the largest duty that will not impede importations is not protection.

That is not protection. No man is willing to put his millions into great enterprises because he only could lose a little. If there is danger of loss at all he will not go into the enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, I have too long occupied the attention of the House, and there is only one matter more I want to speak of, and that is of reciprocity, Republican reciprocity—Republican reciprocity that limits its operations to the noncompeting article. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is all, gentlemen; and that is the only kind of reciprocity that the Republican party has ever advocated or that any of its leaders have ever advocated.

I challenge any man to find a statement fairly quoted from any one of the great leaders of that party that teaches anything else. Oh! the gentleman says, that is impossible, impossible! That is ludicrous, so he says. Did it ever occur to him that there are many importations into the United States that are noncompeting? The millions that we pay for coffee, the millions that we pay for silk, the millions that we pay for fruits of a certain character, the millions that we pay for vegetable importations from the West India Islands, the millions that we pay for hemp and jute and a great variety of articles, and yet the gentleman waves the subject away blandly as ridiculous, as supreme nonsense.

We are in favor, Mr. Speaker, of that kind of a tariff that protects the labor of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are not in favor of taking away the tariff from an article simply because it may become the creature of a trust. You must remember that the primary object of the Republican party in every tariff enactment has been to secure the interest of the laborer, and the interest of the manufacturer was but a mere incident. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] You can not destroy, however, that interest, without its effect upon the laborer.

If there is such a shelter found by the trusts as a tariff schedule, we will take care of the trusts in some other way. We will not pull down the scaffolding of our prosperity in order to reach a trust. The arm of the law, the arm of the Constitution, the arm of the executive force, the arm of the courts, is long enough and strong enough to reach any trust and grapple successfully with it and to protect the people from its evil and harmful influences without the destruction of the great economic laws that during all the years that we have had them have been a benediction to the people. [Great and prolonged applause.]

Mr. LUCKING. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to express surprise at the assault made upon me by the gentleman from Ohio yesterday, and at the assault made upon me by the gentleman from Iowa in the beginning of his remarks this morning. I regret that I have incurred the ill will of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. HEPBURN. You have not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nor have I.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. And the deeper is my regret when I reflect upon the fact that I was standing here yesterday trying to sustain their character by impeaching the man who had defamed it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Ohio charged by indirection that I was a "peanut politician," and the only evidence he offered of that fact was that I quoted here from his letters in the New York Journal. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

While I admit, Mr. Speaker, that it does not approach the dignity of evidence, yet it casts upon me the suspicion of being a peanut politician when I stand in this House and in this country and find myself agreeing in anything with the gentleman from Ohio. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Iowa this morning, referring to the quotation from Mr. Roosevelt's works yesterday that "through the Southern character there ran a streak of coarse and brutal barbarism," said that the strongest evidence of its truth was my speech yesterday, and the only evidence that he produces to show my "barbarity" is that I had so little respect for this House as to quote the barbaric language of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

He says I made a criminal assault upon Theodore Roosevelt. He should change that and put it in the RECORD as it was, that I protested here in this House and before the country against Roosevelt's criminal assault upon the majesty of the law of this land. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the pain of ingratitude is severer than the adder's sting. [Laughter.]

Here I was yesterday agreeing with my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and here to-day the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is agreeing with me in his admission that Theodore Roosevelt did advocate lynch law out yonder on the frontier for stealing a ten-dollar flop-eared Texas pony! [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] felt that I was trying to humiliate him yesterday, as he so declared. This I disclaim. I told him when I began that I was going to show to this House and to the country that I was the best friend he ever had, and just at the time when I was about to begin the manifestation of my friendship my time expired, and the Republicans on that side refused to grant more time.

Now, if the gentleman will listen to me, and if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will listen to me, I will show both of them that I am the best friend they have and the only defender they have against the defamation by Theodore Roosevelt of their characters that has ever appeared on the floor of this House.

I quoted yesterday from Mr. Roosevelt's book wherein he declared that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], naming him, and all who agreed with him in his opposition to the present system of civil service—and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] does agree with him—were "champions of foul government and dishonest politics" in this country.

I came to their rescue. My heart melted with sympathy for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] I saw them smarting under this brand which Theodore Roosevelt had burned into their foreheads; and I saw, too, the rod of Theodore Roosevelt's Administration shaking over their heads.

I saw them crouching and cringing, and heard them begging and crying out, "Glory! glory to Theodore Roosevelt!" [prolonged applause and laughter on the Democratic side], fearing to lift the voice of complaint. I realized their situation. I knew they were fettered and no longer free. I protested in my soul against this aspersion of their good names by the "bronco-buster" of the White House, and I said to myself, "I am going to the rescue of these gentlemen, and speak out for them [prolonged applause and laughter], even if Theodore Roosevelt expels me from this House by Executive order." [Renewed laughter and applause.] And here I am, the only man in this nation who would dare do it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Think of the Republican party, which has for so many years been indebted to the faithful service, for nearly half a century, of these gentlemen, not producing one man who would dare stand up here or elsewhere in this nation and condemn Theodore Roosevelt for traducing their good names. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, what thanks do I get for it all? [Laughter.] Ridicule! I am by interpretation a "barbarian," a "peanut politician," because I tried to remove the brand which Roosevelt had put upon their foreheads, and tried to take away the stigma he had put upon their memories, which must remain in the hearts of posterity [applause] unless it were expunged by order of the House from the works of Theodore Roosevelt. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have, both to-day and yesterday, manifested measureless kindness toward these distinguished gentlemen; and now, after this ungrateful fling at me, I beg them, in the spirit of fraternity, to think of what that great poet and delineator of human character said:

> The wretch whom gratitude once fails to bind
> To truth, to honor and virtue let him lay no claim,
> But stand, confessed before the world, the brute disguised in man!

[Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I not only feel sorry for these distinguished members of the Republican party, but I feel sorry for the whole Republican party, and would immediately leave this band of Democracy here if I did not believe that in their hearts they sympathized with the Republican party in the awful predicament and situation in which it finds itself to-day.

It is like the man that Thomas Jefferson once described as having a wolf by the ears. It was dangerous to hold on, and it was dangerous to let go. That is exactly the predicament of the Republican party in having Theodore Roosevelt on hand as a Presidential candidate. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] He will be your nominee, but you feel and know that it is as dangerous to put him up as it is to turn him down.

Mr. Speaker, this denunciation by Mr. Roosevelt of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] because they did not believe everything which he believed as to the civil service is absolutely monstrous in the face of the fact that but for the "spoil mongers," whom he denounced, the candidacy of Theodore Roosevelt for President upon the Republican ticket would long since have become a vanishing memory. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

More monstrous still, in the face of the fact that he has violated the spirit of the civil-service rules and suspended their operations more than all of his predecessors combined. He has violated it, according to the annual report of the Civil Service Commission, sixty times. Grover Cleveland, with his eight years, not once; Benjamin Harrison, with his four years, not once, and McKinley, with his five years, only three times.

Yet Theodore Roosevelt in his short time has violated these rules and suspended their operation sixty times! Will you refuse to believe, sir, that his spectacular opinions on civil service are monstrous when you consider these facts? [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. LUCKING. I yield thirty-five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, while the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was entertaining, and I may say delighting, the House with the brilliancy of his wit, the versatility of his powers, and the wide extent of his references, a few gentlemen sitting near me suggested that he was paying no attention whatever to the question actually before us, and therefore they thought the very excellence of his performance served but to illustrate strikingly a certain vice of irrelevancy which has overtaken our discussions. That, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say, is a criticism which I think wholly unjust. There never was a speech, there never was an appearance, there never was a performance that illustrated more clearly how directly every vicious perversion of government can be traced to the fountain of all corruption—the protective tariff, which has demoralized our whole political system. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, we have before us a measure which, if it have any justification or explanation at all, is a step toward inducing the Congress of the United States to establish a system of ship subsidies; that is to say, of paying moneys from the Treasury to persons engaged in the business of shipping. It is professedly a bill to provide for an investigation of the subject. It is actually a scheme to induce certain reluctant Members of the majority to take the very short step from indirect to direct use of the public funds for the benefit of private citizens. Now, I can not understand why so many gentlemen who support protection recoil from subsidy. To me subsidy is protection in its full fruit and complete development. The gentleman from Iowa was wise when he undertook to justify subsidy by defending protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The only difference between subsidy and protection is that one is direct and the other indirect. One states plainly the amount of public funds to be bestowed on an individual, the other leaves the amount uncertain. And in all operations of government publicity is preferable to secrecy or mystery.

If this suggestion of subsidy can be explained at all, it proceeds, I assume, on the principle laid down by the late President McKinley in the message by which it was first commended to the attention of Congress. The burden of that message—I have not got it before me now, but I recall its argument perfectly—amounted to this: The transportation of commodities by sea is a highly profitable business, because it is very profitable Americans should be encouraged to engage in it, and from these premises he argued that because this business is very profitable the losses of those engaged in it should be paid out of the Treasury! [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not for a moment claim to understand the force or, indeed, the meaning of that argument. I simply state it here that we can all—Republicans and Democrats—marvel at it together. That argument is not in any way different from the position taken by the report of the committee which recommends the passage of this bill. This proposal must proceed on the fundamental proposition that without subsidies the business of shipping under the American flag would be unprofitable, and therefore would not be carried on. I do not suppose that even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], hardened patriot that he is [laughter], would for one moment suggest the propriety of paying out of the Treasury a subsidy to a business that was in itself profitable. The only excuse for a subsidy must manifestly be the fact that without it the business could not be carried on at a profit. But this also in the last analysis must be the excuse for granting protection to certain industries under our tariff laws. So, Mr. Speaker, while this measure is the most extravagant attempt ever made to bestow funds on private individuals, its introduction has served one good purpose. It has resulted in presenting to the American people and to the American Congress in a new, striking, and singularly clear light the proposition which constitutes the fundamental, essential principle of protection, and that is the propriety and advisability of doing business at a loss. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, that I am not exaggerating, misrepresenting, or misstating this wonderful principle must be self-evident to anyone who takes the trouble to examine it in the light of cold analysis. If business could be done at a profit in competition with all the world, it would not need protection and would not accept it. But if it be proper to pay a man for going into a losing business, would it not, Mr. Speaker, be still more advisable to pay him for going into a paying or profitable business?

An unprofitable business may in the eye of the protectionist be as good for a community as a profitable one, but surely it is not better.

The doctrine of protection, sir, I assume has hardly reached this result—that it is better for the people of a country to have their capital and their labor engaged in losing than in profitable business. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not believe any gentleman of the majority, even the gentleman from Iowa, would maintain that proposition.

If it be advisable to pay persons for engaging in the business of shipping, which, according to the supporters of the bill, must be carried on at a loss, why would it not be at least equally advisable to pay a tailor for engaging in his business of making clothes and a farmer for engaging in his business of agriculture, both of which can be carried on at a profit? And if it be proper to pay a man for engaging in any kind of industry, why would it not be equally proper to pay him for obeying the law—that is to say, for maintaining the peace, since peace is essential to prosperity in every industry? [Laughter.] And after we have paid one man for going into a losing business and another for going into a profitable business and still another for obeying the law—and there we should pay so highly that none but lunatics would disturb the peace—the question must arise, naturally and inevitably, where will we get the money with which to pay all these subsidies?

Now, Mr. Speaker, here we place our fingers upon the very crux of this whole question. If some industries be subsidized—that is to say, if their promoters are to be paid for carrying them on at a loss—there must be some other industries carried on at a profit from whose earnings these subsidies can be paid. Money must be made somewhere, somehow, by some one, before it can be paid out to anyone. If we were all in losing occupations we would all soon be bankrupt, and then no revenues would be paid into the Treasury and no subsidies could be paid out of it. There is one industry in this country that is self-supporting, one business that needs no favor from Government, and that is the basic industry of this land—the business of agriculture. [Applause.] Here, then, must be one of the industries from the profits of which the losses of unprofitable industries must be made good if this system of subsidies be established. Of course, my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], whose eloquence is always picturesque as his arguments are faulty [laughter on the Democratic side] will shy at this deduction inevitable though it be from his argument. He insists—as all protectionists must—that protection or subsidy is a beneficent mantle so extensive that it covers everybody; that is to say, we may all help ourselves to each other's property, and nobody pays the bill. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

This is a most inspiring rhetorical picture, but a very dangerous foundation for the fiscal system of a country. Subsidies do not descend from heaven like rain that refreshes the earth. They must proceed from moneys in the Treasury, and these moneys must be contributed by the industry of the country. There is no other source from which they can come. If the losses of unprofitable enterprises are to be made good, the moneys necessary for that purpose must be taken from the profits of prosperous industries. Now, Mr. Speaker, if prosperous industries must surrender part of their profits to government, that unprofitable enterprises can be subsidized, the inevitable, inexorable result of this splendid system, this very flower of Republican wisdom, this corner stone of Republican policy, is clearly and manifestly to penalize success that inefficiency be rewarded and thus encouraged. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Look, sir, at its practical operation. If protection were as genuine as is pretended—and I am willing to admit, as you gentlemen on the other side believe—if it were universal, if it operated on every man alike, nobody would be benefited, nobody would be injured, and there would be no protectionists on that side of the House or anywhere else. If every gentleman opposite were allowed to take a dollar from his neighbor's pocket, at the end of the operation nobody would be any richer and nobody would be any poorer. Every man would have gained a dollar and lost a dollar, and I do not believe that many of you gentlemen would think a labor so barren worth undertaking. [Laughter.]

I do not believe the gentleman from Iowa would devote an hour of such superb rhetoric to such a ridiculous result. [Laughter.] But if every tenth man were allowed to take a dollar out of the pockets of the nine men nearest to him, then we would find 10 per cent of our brethren opposite growing rich, and I have no doubt delivering speeches, not quite so eloquent, but every bit as logical, as the one we have just heard [laughter], persuading—aye, convincing—the 90 per cent who had been despoiled that their spoliation was really an enormous benefit to them; that it was the fountain of their prosperity, and assured the splendor of their prospects. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Extending the illustration from this Hall and from the gentlemen opposite to the whole country, it must be plain that if everyone were protected in the same degree nobody would be protected at all. It is quite true that everything which anybody wants taxed at the custom-house is put upon the tariff schedules. But in the nature of things, only some articles are advanced in price by the operation of the tariff taxes. Agricultural products are not actually imported to any extent in this country, and therefore they can not be affected by any import duties imposed on them by law. The farmer gets nominal protection in the statute book, but none at the custom-house. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But the subsidy or protection which he can not receive himself he is compelled to bestow abundantly on others. If the price of wheat be $1 a bushel in Liverpool, that is all he can get for it in New York, Chicago, or San Francisco; but hosiery which costs $5 a dozen in an American city can be purchased in Liverpool for two dollars and a half. If, therefore, the farmer were allowed to buy what he needs on the same conditions that must govern the sale of his products, he would be able to get as much hosiery for two bushels and a half as under your law he can now get for 5 bushels of wheat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What is this, sir, but compelling the farmer, every time he buys a dozen stockings, to contribute out of his prosperous, self-respecting, self-sustaining industry of agriculture two bushels and a half of wheat to the enrichment of the individual engaged in the profitless, losing industry of hosiery manufacture. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And in this way protection and subsidy must always operate to penalize profitable—that is to say, successful—industries by diverting part of their profits to the benefit of unprofitable—that is to say, unsuccessful—industries.

I congratulate the country on the introduction of this measure, for the argument by which gentlemen seek to justify it enables us to reach a clear definition of this wonderful protective doctrine, which I offer to you gentlemen on the other side of the House, and which, if you be candid, you will accept, to the enormous benefit of the country, but the temporary disbandment of your organization. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I define protection, and defy any gentleman fairly and fully to controvert the definition, as the assertion that it is advisable for a nation to do business at a loss.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Democrats believe that it is better for a nation to do business at a profit than at a loss, and we believe business can not be done at the highest profit by a nation unless every person engaged in business makes a profit for himself by his own industry and by no other means. Republicans, it is now clear, believe that a country is most prosperous when only a part of its business is profitable of itself, and some of its citizens are encouraged to engage in unprofitable enterprises by a promise of bounties, subsidies, or protection from the profits of the prosperous industries. Surely, sir, it is no exaggeration to say that this measure has served to make clear as day the essential issue between the two parties—the issue between seeking prosperity by Government favor and by the independent labor of the citizen, between paternalism and individualism, between Republicanism and Democracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who has just concluded, and the gallant hero from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who is as brave in facing the reasons of his adversaries as the bullets of his enemies, have both challenged us to name the issue on which this Presidential campaign must turn. Sir, I repeat, the issue is made absolutely clear by this discussion. That issue is not the issue of prosperity, as gentlemen on the other side are fond of declaring. On that there never can be a difference between American citizens or, indeed, between human beings. All men seek prosperity, whatever their condition, whether they be Republican or Democrat, white or black—whether they be civilized or savage. The savage pursuing a wild beast through the trackless forest to secure its flesh for food or its hide for covering obeys exactly the same impulse as the civilized man who drives a plow or wields a pickax, who goes down into the bowels of the earth in pursuit of treasure, or who launches his bark upon the surging seas and turns its prow toward distant horizons. Both are seeking prosperity—that is to say, the things both believe essential to their comfort.

All men who labor, all men who live, seek prosperity; and no division can be made on that issue. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But, sir, there is a distinction between the savage and the civilized man and between men in various stages of civilization, not in the one object which all desire, but in the methods by which that object is pursued. The savage seeks prosperity as he understands it alone—that is to say, he seeks it ineffectually and secures it but scantily; the civilized man seeks prosperity in cooperation with his fellows, and secures it abundantly. And that, sir, is also the difference between men in different stages of civilization. It is the issue between gentlemen on the other side and on this side of the House, the essential difference between Republicanism and Democracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We seek prosperity in abundance by the civilized method of promoting and encouraging intercourse between men. You seek prosperity by trying to restrict the intercourse of men, and thus quite unconsciously you are seeking to maintain methods of barbarism which the world is rapidly outgrowing and which under the influence of a Democratic victory next fall will disappear from the face of the earth. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask just one question?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. I will yield to this question, but I wish to state generally for the information of the House——

Mr. MARSH. Just one question.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. One moment.

Mr. MARSH. And that is whether the gentleman claims that the Wilson tariff bill brought prosperity to the country? He helped frame it.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I helped frame the Wilson bill that went out of this House in a blaze of enthusiasm, fraught with an enormous promise to this country. I voted against the emasculated edition of it that came back here from the Senate, protesting then against the surrender by this House of its absolute and exclusive right to originate every tax and every item of taxation. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] I never believed that the Wilson bill as passed was a tariff-reform measure. I am very glad to discuss my action on it here or elsewhere. It became a protective measure of the worst sort because the protected industries were sufficiently rich, sufficiently desperate, and sufficiently corrupt to tie up the Senate and write their own schedules in the face of that bill. [Loud and long-continued cheering on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say for the information of the gentleman who has just interrupted and of other gentlemen on that side of the House that I do not think one Member, even my distinguished interrupter, should assume to prescribe the whole range of this discussion according to his own particular notion. This discussion is intended for the whole House. If I omit any detail which any gentleman thinks should be discussed, if he will make a note of it and bring it to my attention at the close of this speech I promise to stay here until to-morrow morning, if necessary, and answer every question that ingenuity may suggest and any motive propound. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARSH. I apologize for asking the gentleman a question; but he was discussing here Democratic free trade and the tariff.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. I had not got to that, but I will in a few moments.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman was on the floor when that bill was under discussion, and he was one of the strongest advocates of that bill that brought disaster to the industries of this country.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. After this luminous contribution [great laughter] I will, with the permission of the Chair, resume. [Renewed laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I think I had just stated that there could be no difference among American citizens or, indeed, among civilized men in desiring prosperity. But Americans differ very widely about the methods by which prosperity should be pursued.

Now, sir, it might be well that we should agree in advance on a definition of prosperity. Nothing so tends to confusion of thought in economic discussions as the use of certain phrases, vague, sonorous, and nonsensical, but which have a curious power to befog and often bewilder the minds even of the fairly intelligent. In this House we have very frequently seen them inflame gentlemen on the other side to declaim in favor of saving the country while all the time they were simply bent on holding on to the Treasury. [Great laughter on the Democratic side.] Now, what is prosperity? Mr. Speaker, does prosperity mean, as some gentlemen seem to think, high prices for worthless securities, a few millionaires, enriched by successful speculation? Does it mean the erection of a few palaces without any improvement in the dwellings of the poor? Does it mean an increase in the number of private equipages, additional pomp in public ceremonials, or new splendor in private display? No, sir; because all these are possible, and, indeed, frequent, where the masses are sunk in abject misery.

The sound, the Democratic, conception of prosperity is framed on an entirely different idea. I have defined it in another place, and I repeat it here. Prosperity as Democrats understand it is an abundance of commodities fairly distributed among those who produce them. It means improved cottages, housing and sheltering healthier and happier people. It means better clothing and better shoes covering sturdier limbs. It means more schools, with wider instruction imparted in them. It means more hospitals, with better attendance for the sick provided in them. It means more parks and libraries and museums, with more intelligent people using and enjoying them. It means every resource of civilization brought in greater abundance within reach of those who create the wealth of a country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, sir, if this definition of prosperity be correct, it follows that any system which tends to swell the production of commodities is the system that makes for the happiness, the welfare, and the prosperity of a people.

How is this prosperity to be reached? How are commodities to be produced in greatest abundance? There are but two ways, as I have already pointed out more than once, by which property of any kind can be secured by anybody. One is by production, the other is by plunder. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whenever a man desires anything he must secure it in one of two ways: He must make it or he must take it. There is no other way. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He must make it himself or he must take it from somebody who has made it. What he obtains through exchange—that is, by giving for it something which he has made—is virtuallyproduced by himself. Now, sir, apart altogether from the moral question involved, Democrats believe that production is the only reliable abundant fountain of prosperity [applause on the Democratic side], because the fruits of production are boundless, while the fruits of plunder are necessarily limited. You gentlemen who come in here with a proposal that moneys be taken from the Treasury and given to these shipowners, which they have never produced themselves, must see that your enterprise is a scheme of plunder, for you can not call it production. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the source of everything valuable if it be not production must be plunder. Mr. Speaker, I don't for a moment wish to be understood as suggesting that the gentlemen who advocate this system of subsidies or the citizens who must provide by their industry the means to pay them realize that it is a scheme of plunder. This growing tendency to throw open the doors of the Treasury to every person who applies for largess is a result that flows inevitably from a system of indirect taxation. It is dangerous, distressing, and demoralizing, but it is entirely explicable. Here, sir, is a treasury full to overflowing from sources which no man quite perceives, like water in a well rising from some hidden spring in the bosom of the earth; and when treasure appears to come so easy it is rather a thankless task to deny men who really believe themselves worthy citizens a chance to place their hands on it. A man by the side of a well with a cup or a pitcher would be considered a rather contemptible character if he refused the loan of it to a traveler, weary and thirsty, that he might drink of the spring which appeared exhaustless. And so, Mr. Speaker, we, standing here beside a treasure which seems exhaustless and to proceed from no one in particular, are very naturally exposed to the animadversions, the criticisms, and even the hatred of hungry but ardent patriots if we hesitate to comply with their importunities when they ask us merely to leave the doors of the United States Treasury ajar just a little and they will do the rest for themselves. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said that the policy of protection is essentially a policy of plunder, and it was that statement, I believe, which brought my friend who interrupted a few moments ago to his feet.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. No, Mr. Speaker; I will not exactly yield, but I will submit.

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman, I presume, knows that the six hundred and forty-odd amendments to the Wilson bill, against which the gentleman has made his severe charges, were placed upon that bill by the present leader of the Democratic party in the State of New York, Mr. Hill; and I suppose that the characterizations that the gentleman indulged in applied to the leader of his own party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. The truth knows no distinction of persons, Mr. Speaker, according to Democratic notions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am very much obliged to the gentleman, as I am sure the whole House is, for his repeated contributions, but whether the measure of its gratitude can rise to the value of the contributions is quite doubtful. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that if the farmer, who is necessarily the victim always plundered by partial legislation of this character—if he could understand clearly the system by which he is forced to contribute from his prosperous industry to these losing trades, why, he would meet its advocates with a shotgun or a pitchfork and conduct the discussion on something like terms of equity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Suppose now, for an instant, the exact truth were made clear to him; suppose that immediately after the harvest—it should not be done at seedtime, because that would discourage him too deeply [laughter]—a Government officer entered his establishment and commanded him to set aside a given quantity of wheat for that steel industry so dear to the heart of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], a certain quantity of turnips for the benefit of men engaged in the manufacture of cloth, and a certain quantity of hay for the benefit of some other beneficiaries of your tariffs or subsidies, don't you think the farmer would terminate the system at once—in a moment, if possible—even if to accomplish that result he had to dispense with the enormously valuable services of a great number of Representatives on the floor of this House? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Proud as your country is of you, gentlemen on the other side, and justly proud, the indignation of the men who are robbed by the system you maintain would very probably result in a permanent vacation for most of you the moment the nature and method of the robbery were made clear. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I do not for a moment believe any appreciable number of Republicans realize that the protective system is essentially a system of plunder. I do not believe any number of men in this country, outside of its jails [laughter on the Democratic side], would deliberately encourage or even tolerate an open proposal to plunder. But it is a remarkable though very general feature of social organization that men who will recoil from a vicious proposal made in plain terms will tolerate it and even encourage it when described in ambiguous but attractive phrases. [Laughter and applause.] The man who would be the very first to resist an open invasion of his rights will often permit it and even aid it when it is disguised as a scheme to benefit him. And thus it has come to pass that the farmers of the country not merely permit themselves to be despoiled for the benefit of the protected favorites, but actually assist in their own spoliation when it is called a policy of protection to American labor.

Mr. Speaker, on very slight reflection it must be self-evident that government can not interfere with private industry under any circumstances without perpetrating plunder. This must always be the result whatever the motive that inspires the interference. Surely I do not misrepresent your position, gentlemen on the other side; why, I am quoting the very words of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] when I say you believe that the Government should interfere in private industry for the purpose of protecting labor. That is how the gentleman puts it—for the purpose of protecting labor. The protection of labor may be your purpose—I am quite willing to believe it is your only purpose—but the best of us have our purposes often defeated, and in this case no one can deny that the employers of labor take the profits—all of them—in the first instance, while the laborers are left to get as much of them as they can through the supreme remedy of a strike or the threat of a strike. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I concede the purposes of the gentlemen supporting this measure are of the loftiest. I don't impugn the motives even of the men who are eagerly awaiting its passage. Nevertheless, sir, I lay it down as my fundamental proposition, capable of absolute demonstration, that government can not interfere in private industry except for plunder; that government can not be benevolent without being predatory. I am not speaking now of any particular measure nor of any particular form which these attempts at benevolence may assure. I am advancing a principle which I believe to be self-evident without exception, and absolutely decisive of this entire question when I say that government can not interfere for benevolence, for protection, for subsidy, for bounty, for any benefit whatever to anybody except by plundering the vast majority. An individual can be generous and just at the same time, but a government can not; and that is a limitation inherent in government always. I can give my neighbor anything which I have produced. It is my own. To bestow it on another is an exercise of generosity creditable to my disposition.

But what has government of its own that it can give to anybody? What can government produce through its own operations which could be worth taking? Can it create this desk before which I stand by any exercise of all its powers—legislative, executive, and judicial combined? Can it command the elements of which it is formed to leave their places in the economy of nature and constitute themselves into this article of furniture? Can it order the wool to leave the back of a sheep and convert itself into cloth, and make its order effective by legislative enactment, judicial decree, or executive command? No, sir; all the resources of government together can not create one thing of the slightest value to any human being. There is but one source from which anything of value can proceed, and that is the labor of human hands, exercised on the bosom of the earth. If government can create nothing of its own, it can have nothing of its own to bestow on anybody. If, then, it undertakes to enrich one man, the thing which it gives to him it must take from another man. It can not be generous in one direction without being oppressive in another. If it has a favorite, it must have a victim, and, as I have often said before, no government which is just, no government which is democratic can have either favorites or victims. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LUCKING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would ask how much time the gentleman expects to take.

Mr. LUCKING. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that the same courtesy will be extended to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But let us know how much time the gentleman wants.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking altogether extemporaneously.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, nobody asked that question when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] obtained his extension of time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to be fair with the gentleman in every possible way, but I want a limit fixed, so that we can tell when the vote will be taken.

Mr. CLAYTON. I suggest one hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. LUCKING. I think the House wants to hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be allowed time to finish his remarks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can not the gentleman give us some information as to the time he is to occupy——

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. I am speaking altogether extemporaneously——

Mr. GROSVENOR. So that we may not be entirely in the dark as to how long the debate is to continue.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. My object is to reach light, not darkness. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw my objection to the extension of time, but hope it will be understood that this bill is to continue before the House until a vote is reached, notwithstanding the exhaustion of time.

Several MEMBERS. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may continue until he completes his speech? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, the general propositions enumerated just before the fall of your gavel I have laid down in many different places. I repeat them now because I have never yet seen an answer to them, and if they be self-evident, as I believe they are, it follows that any attempt at governmental benevolence, whether it be called subsidy, protection, or anything else, must always disguise a scheme of plunder. This assertion does not depend for its establishment on abstract reasoning alone. It is shown conclusively by the fruits which the system of benevolence or protection established by this Government has borne, by the demoralization which it has worked in our whole civic life, and which shows itself here in a most significant feature of our debates.

It appears conspicuously in the utterances which have won the heartiest applause from gentlemen opposite.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], as will be remembered in the speech which he delivered here a few days ago, said that the Democratic party was divided, that we did not know what we wanted and did not know how to look for it, while the Republicans know what they want and know how to reach out for it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in different language, repeated the same statement. It is the burden of every Republican song to which I have recently listened.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a perfectly just criticism. The Democratic party has a strong tendency to division. The Republican party has just as strong a tendency to union. There is never any doubt [addressing the Republican side] about what you want [laughter and applause on the Democratic side] nor of the vigor with which you pursue it. We are often divided in opinion as to what constitutes the best policy for the country, and when these divisions arise among Democrats they fight them to a settlement, regardless of the result upon the prospect for office. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You gentlemen have divisions wider than ours. You have differed upon every conceivable question since I became a voter. You differed on the tariff. The gentleman from Iowa felt bound just now to declare that the "Iowa idea" had only just been put to rest. You have differed about the treatment of the Philippines; you have differed about the Spanish war; you have differed about the currency; you have had as wide division on the question of the coinage as ever we had. But no division on a matter of principle was ever sufficient to prevent your combining like one man the moment a chance arose to get possession of the offices. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

There is a great advantage in that Republican tendency. It simplifies decisively the problems of management. You gentlemen [addressing the Republican side] are animated above all by an appetite, and you are determined above all things to gratify it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have beliefs; and beliefs very often engender differences in their interpretation and construction. We suffer all the weakness that comes from preferring principle to office, the good of the country to spoils for ourselves. [Applause.] These divisions among Democrats often result in their defeat. When they have been settled and Democrats united the party has always been irresistible. [Applause.]

Sir, we stand to-day united upon one question, and it is a firm belief that government can not interfere with private industry without despoiling a majority for the benefit of a minority. [Applause.] There is no danger of this working the other way. A minority will never be plundered for the benefit of a majority, because where spoils are divided among so many the share of each would not be worth the trouble of securing it. Spoliation will always be of a vast majority for the benefit of a small minority. That is the essence of your policy; it is the motive power of your activity; it is the object which animates you; it is the fountain of that corruption whose very victims aid you to despoil them, so skillfully are they corrupted. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we are going into this campaign, as the gentleman from Iowa says, torn with distractions, many of us holding different views, perhaps with a disposition to carry our contentions too far for individual comfort. [Laughter.] But that is a feature of Democratic procedure; it simply means that we are going to hold a convention. You are exposed to no such peril. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I congratulate you on your security and on the satisfaction with which you celebrate it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] We will hold a convention, with all the discussions and all the excitements inseparable from it. You will hold a ratification meeting, with all the regularity which characterizes such a performance. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Your proceedings are already arranged for you in a public building at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The very selection of your presiding officer will not be left to yourselves. The platform is already written, and if you think the platform adopted by the Democratic State convention in New York is vague, why, I wait to hear your description of the platform that has been prepared for you in the Washington White House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We will go into that convention determined to do the best thing for this country, and that means the best thing for the Democratic party. And because that convention will be governed by a desire to serve the highest interests of the country, its action will be ratified by the people of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is a marvelous fact, unique, I believe, in the history of all nations, that in the whole course of our country's existence no permanent feature has been added to its political system that did not proceed from the Democratic party, formulated by Democratic conventions, enforced by Democratic Presidents. [Applause on the Democratic side and manifestations of derision on the Republican side.] I wonder if there was any hilarity in that laugh! Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means led that last demonstration; and if it be a specimen of his joy, I hope this House will never see him in a state of sadness. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to my friend that I am delighted with his speech, and I am delighted with the reception of it on that side of the House.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is not carrying submission far enough. He did not accentuate the first syllable of the word that he has just used to describe his emotions. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Why, Mr. Speaker, if this tendency to break away from the model whom Republican leaders must follow in all things should go much further, the Republican party may possibly hold a convention. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE again rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Oh, with pleasure; always.

Mr. PAYNE. "The gentleman from New York" can leave that sort of exploitation and that sort of caricature to the leaders of the minority, the gentleman from Mississippi and his colleague from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] furnishes to this House a striking illustration of what may be accomplished by a minority when it is led by patriotism and genius. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the majority feel proud of this last performance of their leader, well, I congratulate them and the country on the prospect which it opens. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the effect of this predatory policy has been, as I said a moment ago, the entire demoralization of the political and business systems of this country.

No stronger evidence of the extent to which this corruption has demoralized the whole body politic can be conceived than the exhibition which we have had here in this House when you gentlemen of the majority, instead of turning the light of investigation and publicity upon places which your own Administration has shown to be foul, have made yourselves the rampart of corruption by defeating every proposal of investigation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], with the intrepidity which distinguishes him in the face of reason [laughter on the Democratic side], has asked us on this side to definitely show the commission of a specific crime, and when that is done he says we will begin to investigate. Sir, I say that refusal by the majority to investigate is itself proof of crime. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I notice the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the leader of the majority, has endeavored to start a laugh, but, alas! more sensitive consciences around him have smothered it in its very incipiency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is a lawyer, and a good one. He knows that no principle of law is more extensively recognized, more firmly founded upon the experience of mankind, than that which interprets the failure of a party to produce evidence within his control as an admission that if it were produced it would work to his own condemnation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the Post-Office Department is clear of crime, why do you not show it? It would be the very best service you could render your party. Why do you not discredit all our criticism by showing, if you can, that when we have charged crime we have charged it recklessly? Why do you not vindicate before the people the reputation of this body, the grand inquest of the nation, under whose eyes crime has been proved to exist, and which yet remains indifferent to the duty imposed on it by the Constitution?

Convictions of crime in the Post-Office Department have been obtained in the court of justice. There has even been thrown from that sink of iniquity a stream of slanderous abuse over this body. Our own Committee on Post-Offices could not examine it without finding its members bespattered; and when in the name of justice and pure government we ask that the light of examination be turned on every feature of it, that all the facts be given to the American people, we are told by the real, intrepid champion of Republican performances, "When you have proved crime, why, then we will examine it." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, this is but one evidence of the wholesale demoralization worked by this system of plunder. You can not enthrone fraud in the very heart of government itself and then expect that every element of the people will not become corrupted by its operations. When government is organized openly to enrich a few favorites enormously, is it any wonder that its officers will secretly use its powers to enrich themselves moderately? This spectacle of government exploited for private benefit not secretly in violation of law, but openly by authority of law, is the source of all the corruption which has discredited our politics, municipal as well as national. That the moral fiber of our national character remains sound and wholesome is shown by the indignation always provoked by clear proof of bribery. In the city of New York and in nearly all the great cities citizens have been moved to fury when they learned that a bribe had been accepted by some alderman for his vote on the grant of a franchise.

Under the pressure of popular excitement I have known a police officer to be convicted of felony for accepting a basket of peaches as a gift, and whole communities unite in pursuing to the penitentiary a petty inspector for taking $100 to connive at the indifferent performance of some public contract. All these manifestations of popular indignation against corruption are wholesome features of our national character. They show a horror of that vice and a desire to uproot it. But, sir, they will never suffice to purify the streams of civic life. Reforms will never be effected by pursuit of petty offenders while graver wrongs are perpetrated by government itself. Corruption will never be eradicated from our system, it never can be cured, while the Treasury is thrown open to everyone who covets its contents, while huge fortunes are built not upon skill in production, but upon the favor of government, while the majority here in this House maintain a system of laws by which all the industries of the United States are turned over to the plunder of a few favorites.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. I always yield gladly to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; the gentleman from Ohio will take care of himself.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. He is also taking care of the Post-Office [great laughter and applause on the Democratic side], and he seems to be doing it very well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am told by gentlemen—I did not hear it—that the gentleman from New York says that I have said in a speech that when a crime was proven against some official——

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Proven to have existed——

Mr. GROSVENOR (continuing). We would investigate.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Proven to have existed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I never said any such words, and the gentleman from New York either knows or, if he doesn't know, he ought to know I did not make that statement.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. That is not what I said.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said that when a specific charge was made——

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Oh!

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, well; that is what I said.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. I will change my language. I ask nothing better.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is a lawyer or claims to be a lawyer, and he knows that there is a wide difference between a charge and proving a charge.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. The answer, Mr. Speaker, to that statement, the answer is, if we must wait for an investigation till sufficient proof has been found to formulate a charge, the grand juries would have anticipated our action. [Laughter.] That is, I hope they would. What I do say is this: By solemn judgment of the courts the commission of certain crimes in that Department has been established. There is no proof that all the crimes committed have been discovered.

To ascertain the extent of guilt and its whereabouts in every Department is the capital duty of this body as the Grand Inquest of the nation. By failure to perform that duty fully and promptly this House is seriously hurt in its dignity, and therefore I say, sir, the Members ought without the slightest hesitation to make the investigation demanded by justice and the public opinion of the country. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio, bold though he is—and some of us think he is intrepid to the point of recklessness—bold though he is, he can not deny that the course of the majority in closing the doors of the Post-Office Department against any Congressional investigation can be explained on no other ground than that to open them would be to cover the Administration responsible for its affairs with infamy in the eyes of the American people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] There can be no reason for suppressing investigation except the fear that to prosecute it further would reach men whom it would not be safe for the administration of that Department to assail.

The majority knows that to be true, and confesses it by refusing to turn the light of inquiry on the dark places of the Administration. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I have said the corrupting influence of this protective system has affected not merely the administration of public affairs in every department of government, Federal, State, and municipal, but has actually extended to our industrial system. The truth of this has been made clear by the advent of the trusts. While the protected industries were carried on by many different persons and corporations, the worst features of the tariff system were not conspicuous, because the competition of these domestic producers prevented the grossest abuses. But when it was discovered by certain enterprising financiers that domestic competition operated to prevent them from taking advantage of opportunities to plunder the people, they very soon undertook to eliminate that competition by combining all the producers in certain fields of industry into these great trusts, which are a menace not only to business prosperity, but to the moral integrity of the community. [Applause.]

These trusts are subjects of such grave concern to the people that even the supporters of high tariff feel they must be explained, though it is a little difficult to say just how the majority here regard them.

I have carefully examined the utterances of a most distinguished Member of the majority, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], whose views on this subject the President has repeated and emphasized in many ways. So far as I have been able to ascertain his opinion, he seems to hold that some trusts are bad and some good, and that the bad trusts should be regulated or prosecuted and the good trusts coddled.

But, Mr. Speaker, neither the gentleman from Maine himself nor the distinguished occupant of the White House, who has adopted his views, gives us any test by which we can distinguish a trust which is bad from a trust which is good; a trust which should be pursued by the Attorney-General from one which he might encourage; the trusts among which he should, so to speak, run amuck and the trusts among which he should proceed with his hat in his hand. Now, you will observe that this test goes to the very vitals of the whole trust question in its relation to the tariff. If what the gentleman from Maine calls "bad trusts" are essential fruits of protection, if they are possible only under a system of protected favoritism, the conclusion is inevitable that they can be suppressed effectively only by destroying the system which produces them.

I think, Mr. Speaker, there is a perfectly easy method of ascertaining which trust is good and which trust is bad. Whether a trust is good or bad—I think my friend from Maine will agree with me—depends entirely upon whether it operates to raise prices or to lower them. If it raises prices it is an injury to the American people. If it lowers prices it can not do anybody any harm, but must benefit everyone. Applying this test to the actual course of the Administration and the Republican party, it would seem as if their conduct was in direct variance with their theory. The gentleman from Ohio, in that very remarkable speech, echoes of which still linger in my memory, spoke with great pride of the President's course in the case of the Northern Securities Company.

Now, of all the trusts which have been formed in this country, there was just one that did not raise prices, and that was the Northern Securities Company; yet that is the one trust which the President has destroyed [applause on the Democratic side], and he did not destroy it either, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact. The actual effect of his assault has been to make the corporation change its clothing to make it put on a more effective fighting garb. Before the judgment of the Supreme Court the Northern Securities Company was controlled by two elements, the Hill-Morgan element on one side and the Harriman-Kuehne-Loeb faction on the other.

In obedience to the judicial order, a plan for the distribution of its assets has been devised, which with the aid of the Attorney-General has been sustained. Under its operation the Harriman-Kuehne-Loeb element is eliminated from any share in its management and the whole control of the railroads is now entirely in the hands of the Hill-Morgan faction or party. Thus the control which it was thought dangerous to leave in the hands of two factions, combined under the name of a corporation, is placed now in the hands of a single faction. That is to say, it is reduced to a narrower compass than ever, and this, Mr. Speaker, is the net result of that great crusade against trusts which is celebrated here as a triumph of wisdom, patriotism, and courage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, Democrats believe that bad trusts—trusts which raise prices—are not to be regulated, but suppressed; that the remedy is not to prosecute them in the courts, but to prevent them from organizing. It may be asked with perfect propriety, How can we tell what trusts raise prices and what trusts lower them? Why, the answer is very simple. No trust can prosper unless it enjoys some special favor of the hand of government. Trusts which have no favors can overcome competition and dominate the market in one way only, and that is by the excellence or, in other words, the cheapness of their product. There are but two ways by which a trust or corporation can enjoy special favor by government—one is a tariff protection and the other special rates for the transportation of its products and materials.

Granting special rates of transportation to any company the Congress of the United States has already declared to be illegal. There is nothing more that we can do in that direction. If a trust prospers through transportation favors, it can be pursued in the criminal courts, and it will be pursued when a Democratic Executive gets control of the Department of Justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Where the production of any article is controlled by a trust foreign competition is the only corrective influence which can prevent exactions on domestic consumers. When fear of foreign competition is removed by the existence of a high-tariff wall, the consumer is at the mercy of the protected producers. The gentleman from Iowa declared that competition is absolutely essential to industrial prosperity, but in the next breath he lauded a system which restricts competition. What the Democratic party wants is competition, for, as I have said, Mr. Speaker, under a competitive system no industrial organization can dominate the market except by the excellence of its product or its service. The Democratic party always encourages efficiency by protecting jealously and completely all its fruits, however extensive. This is merely saying that always and in all things it believes in excellence [applause on the Democratic side]—excellence in industry, excellence in service, excellence in morals.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. With the greatest pleasure. I am always very willing to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a question on the trust question.

Mr. DALZELL. I would ask the gentleman from New York if those are the same views the gentleman entertained when making Republican campaign speeches in the Republican campaign?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I never made a Republican speech. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I never spoke without declaring my abhorrence of everything for which Republicanism stood, and when Mr. McKinley himself was a candidate and I supported him, it was not because he stood on a platform of his selection, but a platform that was forced upon him by the conscience of the American people. It is quite true that I stood for and supported Mr. McKinley in 1896, and if the same conditions arose again I would do it to-morrow. I would support him when I thought it right, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania would support him when he thought it profitable. That is the difference between us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I will state that I have been informed that it was profitable to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] to support him when he did. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, that is a statement which has been made wherever there has been found a mouth foul enough to utter words behind which there was no conscience. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, the gentleman has made a statement which, in view of the place where it is uttered, calls for a notice which I have always scorned to give it when uttered anonymously. It has been my fortune at various times to support different political parties. I have never yet, thank Heaven, gone through a campaign where some one did not want to throw a stone at me, as the gentleman does now. I challenge him and all the cohorts of vice and crime and corruption that are embodied in the Republican party to show that the national committee ever contributed as much as my railroad fare during all of that campaign. [Prolonged cheers and applause on the Democratic side.] I wonder if the gentleman will answer that.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not suppose the gentleman paid any railroad fare. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. I have paid my own expenses wherever I went; I have paid them not merely in political campaigns, but I have paid them while traveling all over this country on my way to various institutions of learning, to literary and charitable assemblages, and to meetings for the discussion of sociological questions. I challenge the gentleman now, as I challenged Mr. Hanna while he was alive, as I challenged the New York Tribune last fall in New York while Mr. Hanna was still living, and as I now challenge everyone on any side, to show where in the last twenty years I have not been a subscriber to campaign funds rather than a recipient of them. But, sir, I welcome this interruption, as it shows exactly the weapon with which this organized corruption that we call Republicanism means to conduct this campaign. I said it had worked a demoralization of our civic, our political, as well as our industrial system; and who testifies to it so strongly as the gentleman who attributes to me what he must know to be the universal custom among Republican politicians? [Prolonged cheers and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear exactly what the gentleman said. I understand that his remarks applied to me. What was it the gentleman said? I could not hear it for the cheers.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, it ought to be repeated. I think we have reached a point in this discussion which will probably prove of extraordinary value to the judgment of the country in reaching a conclusion upon it. I have said that the gentleman has attributed to me what he knows and must know to be the universal custom of Republican politicians, who thereby illustrate the utter demoralization worked by this system of organized corruption at the basis of government, which makes all industry depend not upon the excellence of the product, but upon skill in corruption.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I can say as to myself precisely what the gentleman has said as to himself with respect to campaigning.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, it would not have been necessary to have stated that to me, for until that interruption I should not have suspected the gentleman; but it has been my experience in life that no man is quick to accuse another of an infamy unless he has become intimate with it himself. [Prolonged cheers and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman had better apply that logic to himself right now, and let me say to him that I said I had been informed——

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. By whom; by whom? Name him; name him.

Mr. DALZELL. By a Democrat.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Name him; name him. Name him now and here.

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. Name him.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Name him, or admit that you are—what can not be said in this House. [Prolonged cheers and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Why, Mr. Speaker, of course I will not name him.

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. Of course not; of course not.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Sir, the man who makes that confession can not interrupt me here again, nor shall I voluntarily permit him to come within the range of my vision. [Prolonged cheers and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the essential connection between trusts and the system of protection is clear from the fact that the sole object of organizing a trust is to eliminate competition, and that is possible only through the aid of a tariff wall. We have seen all the domestic producers of a protected article combined in a single concern, but it has never yet been found possible to combine in one concern the producers of the whole world in any field of industry or to control by any artificial agreement the volume of their product. The vital importance of competition to the masses of the people is shown, sir, by the value placed on the elimination of competition by the organizers of trusts. We have all seen that when a combination of several corporations is formed the stocks of each have been suddenly doubled, trebled, and quadrupled in price, and this increase is not due to any magical power possessed by the promoters, but it is the value placed in the open market upon the power to tax the people which the extinction of competition bestows on the beneficiaries of the tariff.

These trusts are capitalized not on the basis of the property they possess, but on the revenue they could derive by exacting high prices for their products, and this power to extort high prices from the consumers proved to be their most important source of revenue. One company, the United States steel trust, which had property worth $500,000,000, according to the very liberal figures of the United States census, was capitalized at the enormous sum of over one billion and a half. On what was this swollen capital based? Every circular that was sent out by its promoters describing the plan on which the corporation was organized stated that with the extinction of domestic competition it could exact prices sufficiently high to earn liberal dividends on its preferred and the common stock.

What, sir, in the last analysis does this mean? It means that these trusts exercise a power to plunder the American people and that they treat this power as an asset of their own; capitalize it as one of their possessions. To the fair value of its product the trust is of course entitled. Under an honest condition of trade that is all it could exact. The difference between the fair value to which it is entitled and the high price which it is enabled to exact under the operation of the tariff laws constitutes the plunder that it levies on the community. In the case of the United States Steel Company this power to plunder the American people was expected to yield revenues sufficient to pay dividends on a capital three times greater than the value of all its property. According to this valuation this power to levy plunder which this concern exercised was worth twice as much as all the property it possessed. Of its whole capitalization, therefore, one-third is based on property and two-thirds on plunder. [Applause.] Every share of its stock represents one-third property, two-thirds the power to plunder the American people.

Sir, in all the history of the world there has never been anything comparable to this. Not merely do these capitalists exercise the power to levy tribute on the community, not only do they treat it as their own property and capitalize it, they actually offer and sell shares in that power to plunder in the open market. Think of it, Mr. Speaker! Not merely are the American people invited to buy shares in the right to rob themselves, but shares in the power to rob them is offered for sale in the markets of the whole world. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, history tells us that the supreme authority in the Roman Empire—that is to say, the right to tax the Roman people and provinces—was put up at auction by the Pretorian Guards and sold to the highest bidder. And we are accustomed to think of that infamy as the extreme depth of depravity in government. But, sir, the sovereign right to tax the people of this Republic is sold every day before our eyes. The Roman Pretorians sold the power to tax the Roman people in one transaction, so that the bidding was necessarily confined to two possessors of enormous wealth. Our Pretorians sell the right to tax the American people, so to speak, in lots to suit. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] They sell it so as to bring a share in it within the reach of everybody. Any man with $12 can buy an interest in the right to levy tribute on the American people. And it is to this pass that the industrial system of the country has been brought.

It is true that the stocks of these trusts have gone down in value, because there was one strong, correcting influence which the trust magnates did not understand. They thought that they could raise prices without diminishing the volume of consumption. Here is where they made a mistake, the full results of which are not yet apparent. Contracts made before the amalgamation had of course to be filled, and for a year or so afterwards demands continued, profits were large, and all went merry as a marriage bell.

But when these contracts were all filled, the high prices discouraged the making of new ones, demand diminished, profits went down, and stocks began to fall; yet the managers of these trusts could not try to stimulate consumption by the natural method of reducing prices, because they feared that the first effect of reduction would be such a decrease of earnings as might force them to default in the interest on their bonds and fall at once into the hands of a receiver, and in order to maintain high rates for their product here they have sought a market abroad by offering it there at greatly reduced prices.

Now, think of the condition to which this has brought the business of this country. Trusts created by our own Government and protected by our laws are at this moment selling their products to foreign lands for 25 per cent less than they exact from the American people. What does this mean? Why, sir, it means that we can not obtain from our own trusts the "most-favored-nation clause" that we would demand peremptorily from a foreign government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If Germany or France undertook to place a special duty upon wares exported to this country, or to enact revenue laws which would compel the people of this country to pay more for anything necessary to our trade than consumers in other countries are paying, we should break off diplomatic relations with her at once, and we should be very lucky if, while Congress was in recess or down at lunch, the President did not send a fleet of war vessels to bombard her nearest town. [Laughter.]

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] will tell us that there are trusts in England, where trade is absolutely free. Quite true; and because trusts in England have no protection, if they flourish there at all they can only flourish by the cheapness of their products—that is to say, by the excellence of their service to the body of the English people. For that reason, sir, trusts are not unpopular in England, as they are here, where they flourish on tribute exacted from the community.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal that is vague and much that is incomprehensible about "prosperity." Gentlemen on the other side seem to think that the prosperity of the country depends entirely upon keeping control of the Government in the hands of Republican politicians. They tell us—and the gentlemen who interrupted me while interruptions were still decent [applause on the Democratic side] called my attention to the fact—that the Wilson bill was passed in a period of profound industrial stagnation.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MARSH. Stagnation that came upon the country upon the election of a Democratic President.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am about to discuss the necessary effect upon our prosperity of high and low tariff under all Administrations. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] insists that the object of protection is to serve the interests of labor. I agree with him as to the object he has in view, but I believe the actual result of this policy is not to benefit but to injure the laborer. The welfare of labor is the main object of statesmanship in every country, or should be; for, sir, there is no test of prosperity absolutely infallible except the rate of wages paid to labor.

There can be no genuine prosperity except where labor is high and where commodities are cheap, for the same causes produce both results. When wages are stationary and the cost of living increasing, or when wages are rising but moderately and commodities advancing enormously, you have not got a genuine prosperity, but a bastard prosperity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not the permanent, ever-broadening prosperity that comes from Democratic production, but the elusive, temporary prosperity that comes from Republican plunder; a prosperity that dazzles and glitters for a while in the form of fortunes suddenly acquired, but which is always followed by gloomy depression. That is the prosperity through which we have just passed. But, sir, as we are all agreed that the prosperity of the laborer is or should be the object of all statesmen's anxiety, let us see for a moment how the tariff has affected wages, as shown by the operation of trusts.

The price of steel is 25 per cent higher in this country than it is in Canada. At this moment the same manufacturers will lay down in Canada steel rails, structural steel, all manner of steel products, for 25 per cent less than they deliver them in New York, right at their own doors. What is the economic significance of this, Mr. Speaker? It means that the cost of building is advanced enormously, and as a consequence the volume of building is rapidly declining.

If, sir, the price of steel were reduced to its actual value, if we in New York could buy steel at the same rates that our own producers demand for it in Montreal, in Toronto, in Ottawa, and Quebec, there would immediately be such a revival of building activity as would cause a new demand for labor, and that demand would cause an advance in the rate of wages. What is true of steel is true of every other industry. When every field of production became dominated by trusts the prices of commodities were increased enormously while there was a slight rise in the price of labor.

When the laborers saw huge fortunes created by a stroke of the pen, when they saw the addition of two and two in the capital of corporations made not four but twelve, the difference seized by their employers, the price of everything advancing to produce dividends on this inflated capitalization, their wages either stagnant or increased but slightly, they began to struggle not to improve but to protect their condition. They insisted that if they were not to be benefited they should at least not be injured by this prosperity which they witnessed and which Republican politicians, newspapers, and favorites celebrate so loudly. Sir, that demand has been refused. So far from a general advance in wages, it is very generally said that the rate of wages must come down, and on every side strikes and threats of strikes are multiplying.

The protected manufacturers, the beneficiaries of the Government, hold the plunder with ever-tightening grasp, and, far from dividing with the workingman, they are either reducing or threatening to reduce the rate of his wages, while at the same time oppressing him by raising the cost of everything necessary to his existence.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Does the gentleman claim that food products are advanced in price by the tariff?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Why, sir, beef has been doubled in price, I understand. At this moment, I am told, there is a suit pending in which the Government of the United States charges that the price of beef has been doubled, or at least largely increased, through an illegal combination, and I am sure the gentleman will accept at least the sworn statement of this Administration. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Has the tariff advanced the price of the food products raised by the farmers of my State?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Yes——

Mr. LACEY. Then what becomes of the gentleman's theory that the prices of food products are fixed in Liverpool without regard to the tariff?

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. Pardon me; let me finish. Wherever the tariff has been operative the trust has utilized it to raise the price of products to the consumer. It has not yet been able to touch the price of wheat. But if you continue this system, a trust will arise strong enough to control the breadstuffs of the world and increase their price, although the farmer will get no benefit from the advance. He will get no benefit because there will be a diminishing demand, under which the trust will send down the price to the producer while at the same time increasing it to the consumer. The beneficiary of the tariff, the favorite of the Republican party, the contributor to its success alone will be benefited. He will have still more spoils at the expense of producer and consumer alike. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, protectionists tell us that high prices of commodities always accompany high wages. Nothing could be further from the truth. High prices do not indicate high wages, but low wages. Wages are always highest where prices are lowest.

In this country, where the wages of a laborer are from one dollar and a half to $2 a day, the price of beef, bread, clothes, shoes, and every necessary of life is 50 per cent less than in Mexico, where the rate of wages for similar labor is about 25 cents a day. In Italy, where protection is high, wages are about half as high and the necessaries of life are twice higher than in free-trade England. This is not a matter of speculation, but of demonstration.

Mr. Speaker, there is but one way in which wages can be raised, and that is by increasing the production of commodities. There is no other way. For it is only by increasing the volume of commodities that you can stimulate a demand for the labor necessary to produce them. At the same time, sir, all increase in the volume of production must increase commodities, and that necessarily means a diminution in their price. Thus, sir, you see the very same condition that leads to an advance of wages leads to a fall in the cost of living.

Whenever you have a prosperity resting on industry alone you have a prosperity attested by advancing wages, falling commodities, abundant employment, and abundance of the things which employees and employers need for their subsistence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, at this season all political debates, whatever be their subject or their theater, are addressed ultimately to the political campaign just before us, and I may be asked how will the principles for which I have been contending be affected by the Presidential election. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that, whatever the result of this election, it will not be possible to change the actual fiscal system of the country. Even if we carry the country next November, even if we elect the President and a majority of this House, the Senate will remain Republican for the next four years.

But, sir, though no actual change in the protected system is possible its further extension can be arrested. Such a measure as this will never survive one Republican defeat. [Applause.] Democratic success will have one result of surpassing importance. It will prove to the world that the conscience of the American people has awakened to the true character and inevitable results of these predatory enterprises—enterprises of plunder at home and abroad, enterprises alike dangerous to our prosperity and ruinous to our fame—all of which will wither and disappear before one emphatic expression of popular condemnation. The gentleman from Iowa has said that the Democratic party has not yet decided on a candidate or a platform. I confess that to be true. None the less, I firmly believe the Democratic candidate, whatever his name, will be elected, because the defeat of the Republican party is absolutely necessary to the preservation of republican government in this country, and republican government, I am confident, is not destined to perish from the face of earth. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But to explain this belief and justify it I must go back to a statement from which I was diverted by an interruption in the early part of this speech.

Mr. Speaker, every addition to our political system which has proved permanent is of Democratic origin. Whatever Democrats have contributed to our Government is absolutely secure, for if it were assailed all men, without distinction of party, creed, or sect, would rise unanimously to defend it. The Democratic interpretation of our Constitution by Jefferson has remained its governing principle for over a century. Who to-day would undertake to change it? Who to-day would venture to suggest that any class, however learned or rich, is a safer depository of political power than the whole body of the people? Expansion began with the acquisition of Louisiana, and you gentlemen on the other side showed the corrupting influence of your policy when you perverted that Democratic doctrine of extending the beneficent sway of the Constitution by peacefully extending our frontiers over contiguous territory to justify enterprises of conquest and destruction in distant lands when, instead of insisting that wherever the flag might wave the Constitution must govern, you unfurled that glorious standard over forces sent to plunder men who had been your allies [loud applause on the Democratic side], robbing and killing those who had assisted you in a great enterprise of liberation. [Renewed applause.] Expansion, as you have misinterpreted it, does not operate to extend the authority of our Constitution, but to extend the power of our officeholders and the profits of your favorites, as you seek to gratify the rapacity of our shipowners in your very latest legislation. [Renewed applause.] Sir, the Democratic idea of expansion is the one which will be permanent. A Democratic victory next year will reestablish it forever. [Applause.]

The doctrine that control of our national funds by a single bank was dangerous to the fiscal system of the country and to the independence of its politics was not only asserted but established by Andrew Jackson. Who to-day would restore the system that he destroyed?

Not only has every permanent change or development in our political system been of Democratic origin, but, while many proposals have been made to modify our constitutional structure, not one has ever found its way permanently into our Government that Democrats unitedly opposed. It is the most remarkable feature of our history and, I believe, absolutely without parallel in the history of the world that a political party, even when it has been defeated at the polls, when it has been excluded from office, when it has been reduced to a small minority, has yet been able to prevent the adoption of any policy to which its members were unitedly opposed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] At the very beginning of our Government the Federalist party enacted the alien sedition law. It was supported by some of the most illustrious men who had made the Revolution successful. Democrats opposed it unitedly. It is repealed, gone, disappeared forever. Who now would undertake to revive it?

But, sir, this capacity of the Democracy to govern, even in defeat, the permanent policy of the Government was shown most conspicuously and decisively after the war.

On the questions that precipitated the civil war Democrats were divided and the party was defeated. Northern Democrats believed in sustaining the Union. They bore the burden of the war, contributing to its expenses and furnishing in a large degree the soldiers who fought for the Northern side, while Republican officers obtained the glory and Republican contractors made the fortunes. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

They recruited the regiments that opposed storms of shot and shell from Confederate batteries, that resisted charges of bayonets which no other soldiers could have withstood, that met the crash of cavalry on a hundred fields and made the Union triumphant against an enemy who could not be conquered and who surrendered only when there was not a round of ammunition left to charge a soldier's gun or a single ration to support a soldier's life. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But when the last shot had been fired, when the smoke of conflict had lifted from the last battlefield, when the South, beaten yet sublime in her defeat, knelt amid the ruins of her hopes and the ashes of her cities, the true disposition of the North was expressed, not by the Republican politicians who sought to humiliate and degrade her, to hold her in subjection to the Federal Government, while excluding her from any share in its control; but it was expressed by Democrats, who insisted that the arms of the nation should be stretched out to their wounded, impoverished, sorely stricken sister, not to oppress her further, but to lift her from the ground on which she was prostrate, to encircle her in a glad embrace of reconciliation, and welcome her back to the great bosom of a reunited country. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

Republican leaders and politicians undertook to reconstruct the country on a policy of pacification by punishment and proscription. Carpetbag governments were established and supported by bayonets, which resulted in infamies at which Republicans have at least learned to blush. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To this policy of pacification by punishment and proscription Democrats opposed a policy of pacification by pardon, and in support of that policy they came together as one man, all their past differences buried and forgotten. On that issue Democrats went down again and again in repeated defeats, but they never wavered in support of it. The election of 1872 seemed to be a crushing and final defeat of the party, a complete popular indorsement and approval of carpetbag governments and all their infamies. Republican politicians so interpreted it. A State government was overthrown on an order made by a drunken Federal judge at midnight. In another State the legislature was dispersed by troops under the command of a Federal officer. Dragoons rode all over the South, attempting to maintain a hideous travesty of government, repugnant not only to the people whom it oppressed, plundered, and outraged, but to the civilization of the age. And yet, sir, notwithstanding defeats, discouragements, discredits, disasters, and long exclusion from office, Democrats denounced these assaults upon justice and humanity, and their opposition prevailed. Though its candidates failed at the polls, the principles of the Democratic party triumphed on the statute book, and the actual final reconstruction is not Republican, but Democratic. [Applause.]

Sir, the Democratic plan of pacification by pardon instead of by proscription has become the final policy of the nation, and its results constitute a glorious contribution to the civilization of the age. Instead of a country holding in subjection by force conquered provinces, sullen, injured, resentful, we have a country of reunited States, reunited not by arms or fear of punishment, but reunited in an affection, a loyalty, a patriotism that can never die. [Great applause.] I do not believe there is a man on the other side who would to-day advocate a restoration of carpetbag government, who would countenance the issue of a judicial commission to another Darrell, or tolerate the invasion of a State legislature by Federal troops.

Sir, Democratic patriotism has restored to the people of the Southern States control of their own governments, but the South has not yet been wholly and completely readmitted to the Union. She is still suffering from a serious disability, imposed not by statute, but by practice and by custom. The Union can never be considered fully reestablished while a great section of the country is excluded from any hope that the Presidency can be reached by any of her sons. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, Republican extravagance, Republican corruption, Republican recklessness, Republican contempt for justice, Republican hatred of constitutional limitation have borne one fruit of great value. They have awakened the conscience of the nation to the absolute necessity for change in the control of its Government if republican institutions are to survive in this country. Whenever there has been imminent danger that a policy distinctively Republican is in danger of becoming a permanent feature of our Government the Democracy has always been recalled for the express purpose of expelling it from our political system. That danger is now clearly imminent, and therefore a change in administration is certain to come. It will come now by the success of the candidate nominated in the next Democratic convention, whether he be the gentleman recently offered as a candidate by the Democracy of New York or whether, as may well be the case, the necessity for punishing boodlers and naming an effective inquisition of wrongdoing in the different Departments should make us go to Missouri for a candidate, where a Democratic officer has shown how to pursue effectively offenders even of his own political party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whoever may be selected, he will win, and his success will not be a mere party victory, but a great national triumph, because on the platform adopted at our convention we mean to place, or at least I hope there shall be placed, a representative of the South, a Member, sir, I venture to hope, of this body, the man who has led the minority here from division to union, from incapacity to great efficiency, from a distracted multitude to a singularly effective opposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, in the generous applause awakened by this suggestion even on that side of the House, I read not merely an assurance of a great victory for the Democracy, but a promise that its success will be a regeneration of this land, a full reunion of the sections, and a cleansing of corruptions bred by the long success of sectionalism. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have arisen, sir, to tell the gentleman who has taunted us here with uncertainty of purpose what our great underlying, commanding purpose shall be. It is the expulsion from our system of everything for which this Administration stands by bringing upon it a decisive expression of popular condemnation and the final completion of reconstruction according to Democratic policy, the full readmission of the South to this Union by the election of a southern man either to the Presidency or Vice-Presidency. [Applause.] When the last cloud left by the civil war shall have been dispelled, when its last blood stain shall have been washed from our flag, when the rehabilitation and reconciliation of both sections shall have been made complete, and every part of this country shall move together in the full harmony and cordial cooperation of a perfect Union toward measureless prosperity, then, sir, the Democratic party will have taken but the first step in the great mission which awaits it. All these will be accomplished by the mere success of the Democratic candidate next November.

After its inauguration the first duty of a Democratic Administration will be an investigation of the wrongs which the majority here are seeking to conceal, an investigation of the Departments by honest men whose abhorrence of fraud is so keen they will pursue it to the darkest corner in which it can take refuge, and, this done, the Democratic President must, by the excellence of his own service, establish the standard by which all future Administrations will be judged. [Applause.] Sir, when good government shall have been enjoyed for four years its blessings will be so abundant and so conspicuous that the conscience of the people will be awakened to the pressing necessity of making the moral law the governing principle of our industrial as well as of our political system. That is a task which will need the cooperation of a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress, and both will be the fruits of the approval which Democratic control of the executive department will win during the next four years. [Applause.] So, sir, our purposes are not uncertain, as gentlemen opposite affect to think, but they are clear as they are salutary. They embrace an immediate abandonment of the dangerous policies and tendencies of the present Administration, a complete healing of the wounds still open after nearly forty years of peace, the reform of government, the exposure of corruption, the punishment of wrongdoing, and ultimately, when we secure control of Congress in both branches, the organization of our industrial system not on the plunder of any, but upon the union of all in peaceful and profitable production. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Iowa has taunted the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] for saying he would like to see every custom-house shattered

From turret to foundation stone.

That line, sir, referred to Tantallon Castle. Tantallon Castle was a feudal structure in Scotland, around which raged constantly a tide of war and plunder as some men sought to enrich themselves by seizing the property of others. Tantallon Castle has fallen with the feudalism and barbarism of the age which it typified. I hail it, sir, as an auspicious feature of this discussion that a phrase applied to the feudal castle which has perished before the march of civilization and the spread of peace should be used to express a hope that the world may some day see the disappearance of custom-houses, which are survivals of a barbaric distrust that tends to isolate men from each other and to prevent them from uniting and cooperating in the cultivation of the soil for the benefit of each man. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What is the essential difference between civilization and barbarism? Civilization means the close intercourse of men for peaceful and productive cooperation; barbarism means the isolation of men or else their meeting in savage and destructive conflict. Factories from whose chimneys the smoke of industry rises like incense to heaven are outposts of civilization. It is the fervent hope of Democrats that they be multiplied. Fortresses and custom-houses are the twin relics of barbaric distrust which prevent profitable cooperation and encourage wasteful plunder. Surely it is patriotic and humane as well as Democratic to cherish the hope that ultimately this earth may be purged of both. [Applause.]

Mr. LOVERING. Will the gentleman yield? I want to ask the gentleman before he sits down how he will explain away our idle factories during the years 1893, 1894, and 1895, with people walking the streets——

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. I thank the gentleman for the interruption. It was something which I had overlooked. The gentleman is determined, probably, to make my speech a little long, but I think the conditions he mentions should be explained to the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Go on a couple of hours; we will wait for you.

Mr. COCKRAN of New York. The gentleman will never have spent two hours better. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] has called my attention to an omission, for which I apologize to the House. I have said that the Democratic party has always been the force which contributed permanent features to the development of our Constitution and defeated every dangerous proposal which Republican politicians or their predecessors had attempted to inject into our political system.

I should have added that there is one other mission which the Democratic party has been frequently called upon to perform, and that is to rescue the country from the industrial depression which has never failed to follow any extended period of Republican ascendency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman must recall two great panics, one in 1873 and one in 1893. They both proceeded from the same causes and both were cured by exactly the same remedy. They both were the result of Republican profligacy, the same Republican profligacy which has brought over this country now the shadow of a disaster that disturbs the confidence of Republican leaders and endangers the volume of contributions by Republican financiers, the gravest danger that can threaten the prospects of that party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The panic of 1873 was caused through the extravagance and profligacy of Republican administration here in Washington. The panic of 1893 proceeded from precisely the same cause. And just as long as Republican administrations scatter the contents of the Treasury with lavish hand—that is to say, just as often as Republican Presidents occupy the White House and Republican majorities control Congress—every period of Republican ascendency will be followed by violent panics and long periods of depression. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on the other side seem to think that there is a different law governing the property and prosperity of a nation from that which governs the property and prosperity of individuals. But no state can waste its resources and escape distress any more than an individual can dissipate his capital and escape bankruptcy. I do not care how rich a man may be, if he spends more than his income he must either retrench or collapse. If he has a million dollars a year and he spends a million and a half, one of two things must happen. He may continue his extravagance and become hopelessly bankrupt, or he may stop his extravagance and begin to retrench. If he begins to retrench in time, the restoration of his solvency is certain, but the period of retrenchment will be very unpleasant. What is true of an individual is equally true of a nation. Under Republican Administrations this Government has nearly always lived beyond its revenues. From final and irreparable disaster the country has always been delivered by Democratic reformers. Because Republicanism has been profligate it has maintained an appearance of splendor, which the unthinking often mistake for prosperity; while the Democratic party, which is essentially frugal, suffers from a certain unpopularity which stern economy always provokes.

From the close of the war to 1873 the Republican party was in absolute control of the Government in all its branches, and as a consequence the Treasury was wide open. One patriot after another helped himself to its contents. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] They finally began to quarrel over a distribution of the spoils, and through their disputes the extent of the corruption became public.

The Crédit Mobilier scandal made plain a political demoralization so widespread that it affected even the Congress of the United States, while a financial panic of great severity produced widespread distress, and the people awoke to a conception of their condition. They sent down a Democratic majority to this House which reduced the cost of government decisively, while by exposing fraud and driving the perpetrators from public life it created a wholesome public sentiment which checked for many years any revival of extravagance. After five years of very strict economy the country, which had been plunged in industrial prostration, rose once more to its feet and entered quite naturally upon a period of prosperity, and of this the Republicans stole the credit. [Applause on the Democratic side and laughter on the Republican side.]

The panic of 1893 presents the same story in the causes that produced it and the patriotic service which remedied it. In 1889 a Democratic Administration left office. It had accumulated a surplus in the Treasury of over one hundred millions. The question which perplexed the people was how they should dispose of their treasure. The prosperity was enormous and growing every hour, as genuine prosperity always must grow.

In 1888 the protected industries, whose right to levy taxes on the people had been challenged by a Democratic Executive, were able to purchase an election. The Democratic candidate was defeated, and within two years that treasury, which had been full to overflowing, was a gaping void. Through profligate expenditures and a ruinously restrictive tariff the revenues which had been yielding a surplus sank below expenditures until at the end of the Harrison Administration the Secretary of the Treasury was on the point of issuing bonds to obtain sufficient funds for the support of government. By a vicious financial system a delusive appearance of prosperity was still maintained. Financiers gambled on Wall street and appeared to be making enormous gains. Speculators were buying yachts and projecting the erection of palaces, but wages had no increase. The inevitable consequence of that fictitious prosperity followed. A growing deficit in the Treasury made the advent of a panic certain. The Democracy came into power at the very hour that Republican profligacy culminated in disaster. The dark cloud of industrial distress appeared in the financial sky, not from the Wilson bill, but before a word of it was written. It settled down over the length and breadth of this country like a pall, wrapping in its sinister folds countless thousands of homes, while the gaunt specter of starvation was seen once more stalking through American highways and knocking at the doors that sheltered American labor. There is danger, sir, to fear a reappearance of the same specter, now that the prosperity which Democrats restored after 1893 is again endangered by the iniquities of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The depression which followed the crash of 1893, produced by Republican profligacy, was relieved by Democratic frugality and honesty just as prosperity was restored after the crash of 1873. To-day, sir, we see many reasons to apprehend the collapse which always follows Republican ascendency. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], who interrupted me, to tell the House why it is that business has decreased so seriously during the last year by the confession of everyone? Some may doubt whether we are on the verge of a panic, but nobody will deny that business has declined. Why has it declined, I ask you gentlemen who insist that Republican ascendency is all that is necessary to insure prosperity? You say that Mr. Roosevelt is as good as reelected. You say that Republicans are secure in the control of government for the next four years. Why, then, is prosperity disappearing when all the conditions of prosperity, according to the Republican evangel, are here? Has there been any failure of crops? Have floods broken loose and overflowed the banks of our rivers, submerging farms and wrecking houses? Are our mines any less rich in treasure? Are our fields less fertile? Are men less industrious or less moral? Is there any cloud of war on our horizon?

No one will pretend that any of these disasters has befallen us. And, Mr. Speaker, if Providence has not withdrawn His favor from us, there can be no other cause for the decline in our prosperity than the folly or corruption of man. [Applause.] It may be said here, sir, as it has often been said before, that industrial depression always follows industrial prosperity, according to some mysterious law which none but Republican politicians has been able to discover. Sir, there is no such law. If this had been a genuine prosperity, every day that it lasted would have insured a morrow of wider production. If prosperity means abundant production, every day of prosperity must result in swelling the amount of capital available to reenforce the hands of the workingman, to make his product larger and therefore his wages higher than ever before. But this prosperity, sir, must be a prosperity coming from production. If it be a prosperity coming from plunder, it is evasive, delusive, temporary, always followed by exhaustion of the plundered and demoralization of the plunderers, the serious restriction of industry, the prolonged stagnation of all commerce. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, I ask again, has prosperity declined in this country? I will tell you. Prosperity has declined and is declining because it is not built wholly on production, but largely on plunder; because the business of the country in large measure is either carried on at a loss or on false pretenses—at a loss if tariff protection be necessary to make it profitable for its promoters; on false pretenses if it would be self-sustaining without any assistance from the Government. At the same time the necessity for disposing of the enormous revenues produced by high protection has led to extravagant appropriations, profligate expenditures, demoralization of our entire system, political, social, and industrial. Here, sir, are abundant reasons for the decline of our prosperity and for the recurrence of that depression and stagnation which confront us. Sir, what is the remedy? It is simply to reform. Cease extravagance. End the system that breeds it. Encourage every man to engage in industry by preventing anyone from profiting through the spoliation of his neighbors. When all men are secure in the enjoyment of everything produced by their labor, there is no limit to the number of human beings that this soil can support, for then every man, being employed profitably, will produce more than he can consume, and then every increase of the population will be a fountain of additional wealth to the community. [Applause.]

Sir, we read in the Scriptures that when the children of Israel were famishing from thirst in the desert, Moses, by striking the rock with his rod, brought forth abundant streams of water by which they were refreshed and saved from destruction. Democrats believe that as the rod in the hands of the prophet brought forth abundant streams of water from the rock the spade in the hands of labor can bring commodities in measureless abundance from the bosom of the earth. [Applause.]

In concluding this speech, extended much longer than necessary by reason of the many interruptions with which I have been favored, I repeat, sir, that the distinction between the two parties can be reduced to an exceedingly narrow compass.

Republicans believe that prosperity can be created by legislation; we believe that if it be genuine it must be created by labor. You believe that success in manufacture should depend on the favor of government; we believe it should depend solely upon the excellence of the product. You believe that part of the people should be paid for engaging in unprofitable occupations from the profits of self-sustaining industries; we believe that every member of the population should be employed in profitable industry and left to support himself and enrich himself by his own labor and nothing else. The whole Democratic faith is embraced in one principle, which can be formulated in a single sentence. If I had my way I would make it the whole Democratic platform, for it embodies every principle of government which Democrats believe essential to the welfare and peace of a nation. It is the principle that government has no right to do anything for one man that it can not do and does not do for all men. That Democratic principle of equal rights for all is the true principle of security, of glory, and of prosperity. Build your laws upon it and the foundation of your Government will be so firm that no convulsion can ever disturb it, and your flag will acquire a brighter glory than has ever entwined it. Make it the basis of your industrial system, and your prosperity will not be delusive or temporary, interrupted by recurring panics and long periods of industrial stagnation, but it will be permanent, uninterrupted, and real, for its source will not be the ever narrowing fountain of plunder, but the ever widening fountain of production, and its tide will be abundant, measureless, deepening, growing forever and forever. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, the majority report of the committee provides for the appointment of a commission of ten, four of whom shall be members of the minority party in Congress. It will not be amiss to discuss this proposition for the information of the Members of the House, as well as for the enlightenment of the American people.

The matter of subsidies or bounties, which means pecuniary aid, is simply another form of paternalism. The action of the majority of the members of the committee that reported this bill is in keeping with the policy of the Republican party to afford aid in the shape of a protective tariff to manufacturers, a bounty to sugar planters and other so-called "infant industries."

Let it be clearly understood that the members of the minority of the committee having this legislation in charge are as anxious to promote the growth and prosperity of the merchant marine as our friends on the other side, but not at the expense of the taxpayers. The report of the minority is clear and emphatic on this subject.

The majority say:

> But this is not a subsidy measure; it is simply to ascertain the needs of the merchant-marine service and to apply the best remedy; therefore in no sense is it a partisan proposition.

When the bill was discussed in the committee, a resolution was offered to have the commission consist of twelve members, with equal representation to the two political parties, thus making it an absolutely nonpartisan measure. The majority members promptly voted it down.

In view of the past record of the Republican party and its present position on this and other matters of a similar character, it is safe to assume that the findings of the commission will be in favor of a ship subsidy. Our Republican friends in 1896 thought differently, as their national convention of that year in St. Louis declared against ship subsidies. Since then a change has come over their dreams, and they are now in favor of giving bounties to the merchant marine of the country. An active lobby has been very busily engaged here in Washington for several years past in favor of bounties.

As the amount of tonnage to foreign countries carried by ships flying the American flag is gradually decreasing, something should be done to secure the needed relief, and that, too, as speedily as possible. Why delay this matter a year or more when it should have been done during the present session of Congress?

The Committee on Merchant Marine, consisting of seventeen Members of the House, is certainly capable of taking care of the matter. At the head of the committee stands one of the leaders of Congress, who would in all probability be placed on the proposed commission. Is not the committee able to handle this vexed question, and, if feasible, bring about speedy relief?

Regarding the matter of bounties, Great Britain pays mail-ship subsidies amounting to $4,500,000 yearly. In addition, Admiralty subsidies are paid amounting to $389,000. The latter item is intended to encourage the merchant marine of that country and is the only subsidy paid by that Government.

Germany pays annually $2,087,500 bounty to her steam and mail ship lines. The German Government grants some indirect forms of encouragement, namely: Exemption from payment of customs duties and preferential railway rates.

Under the first of these manufactured articles intended for shipbuilding are admitted free of duty, and under the second special rates are made for through bills of lading in the matter of freight on the railroad and steamship lines.

France in 1901 granted postal subsidies amounting to $5,336,355; for construction or shipbuilding, $1,160,000; for navigation, $2,440,000, making the total bounties paid by the French Government in that year $9,936,355. Yet the tonnage of ocean commerce carried is but 5.43 for the year ending June 30, 1903.

Russia pays for postal bounties $233,475; only one steamship company receives postal and nonpostal bounties. Russia pays liberal bounties for the transportation of troops, ammunition, and passengers. However, it should be stated that the Russian volunteer fleet which receives bounties is owned by the Government.

Austria pays two kinds of bounties: First, parcels post, mainly for postal services and moneys advanced by the Government for shipbuilding, without interest; second, bounties granted for trading and ship subsidies, paid to the mercantile marine ships of the nation, amounting to $300,000. Austria's total bounties amount to $1,594,940.

The Italian Government policy (laws of 1901) aims at the increasing of navigation bounties and decreasing construction bounties.

In Holland subsidies are only paid for value received, as an indemnity for the transport of mail. They are not paid for construction or navigation purposes.

The bill which passed the Senate March 17, 1902, provided liberal bounties. The amount of subsidies to be paid annually under it was not to exceed $5 000,000 yearly until 1907, when the maximum was not to exceed $8,000,000.

This was evidently an entering wedge, for no one acquainted with the facts will claim that these sums would materially increase our merchant marine. If subsidies are to be granted for this purpose, they should be large enough to accomplish the desired ends. Ex-Commissioner of Navigation Bates estimates that to give the aid intended under the Hanna-Frye bill would require $40,000,000 yearly at this time.

For eight years or more we have been paying to the American Steamship Company, of New York, the sum of $750,000 yearly in the shape of a subsidy. The result has been that from two vessels then brought under the American flag we now have four—City of Paris, New York, St. Louis, and St. Paul. Rather a slow growth for the expenditure of over $6,000,000 by the Government.

It is claimed, especially by our Republican friends, that other nations pay subsidies and the United States must also do so. This is an error, as France alone really pays bounties.

There are about fifty lines of steamships between Europe and this country. Most of them never receive a penny of Government money, not even for mail carriage. Two only receive subsidies—the French line and our own American line.

The other great Atlantic lines—the Cunard, White Star, and the two German express lines, the fastest steamers in the world—receive no bounty. They are paid so much per pound for mail matter carried.

Our people own many foreign-built ships sailed under a foreign flag; the number is estimated at 100.

In our coastwise commerce all must be carried by American vessels flying the American flag. This trade, according to the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor, amounts yearly to 20,000,000 tons and requires a large number of vessels to carry it, while the entire foreign trade, exports and imports, last year amounted to 28,466,763 tons.

The British House of Commons in 1901 appointed a special committee of thirteen members, of which Mr. Evelyn Cecil was chairman, to thoroughly examine into the matter of ship subsidies. This committee held thirty-two sittings, examining forty-one witnesses, experts in different lines affected by the matter, and after going into the subject of bounties exhaustively for nearly two years reported at great length to Parliament.

On page 10 of the report we find the following:

Your committee after due consideration is of the opinion that the principle of subsidies by or for the Admiralty is only justified for obtaining a limited number of vessels of the highest speed and great coal endurance among the mercantile marine, built according to Admiralty requirements for purposes of national defense, providing that the Admiralty find it more economical to subsidize swift merchant steamers than to build naval ships.

From the statements of eminent men who appeared before the committee and gave evidence in the matter, the following extracts are selected:

Mr. William Redmond, M. P., in answer to a question, said:

Yes; I think it would be very much better to spend the money on a war ship than to subsidize an ordinary merchant ship, however fast she may be.

In reply to the question, "Would you say that subsidies are unfair?" Sir Robert Giffin, an authority on this matter, said:

Undoubtedly; and if things were let alone I believe that almost all governments would find that out in time, but it might do a great deal of mischief in the meantime.

Other well-known experts gave similar testimony.

This committee of distinguished gentlemen, after a complete and thorough investigation, made the following final report to the House of Commons, which was adopted and sent to the House of Lords, where it is being considered:

1. That the granting of shipping subsidies, at considerable pecuniary cost, by foreign governments has favored the development of competition against British shipowners and trade upon the principal routes of ocean communication and assisted in the transfer from British to continental ports of some branches of foreign and colonial trade, but that notwithstanding the fostering effect of subsidies upon foreign competition, British steam shipping and trade have, in the main, held their own, and under fair conditions British shipowners are able to maintain the maritime commerce of the country.

2. That subsidies are the minor factor, and commercial skill and industry the major factors, of the recent development of the shipping and trade of certain foreign countries, and notably of Germany, where, for example, the granting of through bills of lading via the state railways has had an important effect. In some other countries subsidies have led to no satisfactory results.

3. That the subsidies given by foreign governments to selected lines or owners tend to restrict free competition, and so to facilitate the establishment of federations and shipping rings, and therefore that no subsidy should be granted without Government control over maximum rates of freight, and over this combination of subsidized with unsubsidized owners to restrict competition.

4. That the competition of British shipowners with their commercial rivals upon unfair conditions, without government interference by way of subsidies, or by way of control of freights, is more healthy and likely to be more beneficial to the nation and empire than a state-subsidized and state-controlled system under which the shipowner would have to depend less upon his individual energy and skill and more upon the favor and support of the government.

5. That a general system of subsidies other than for services rendered is costly and inexpedient.

6. That rare cases occur where, in view of special imperial considerations, subsidies are necessary for establishing fast direct British communication, and that at the present moment such a subsidy should be favorably considered for a line to East Africa, where there is no direct British steamship service, and where British trade is handicapped by foreign subsidized steamship lines.

From this report it seems clear that subsidies or bounties will not help the languishing merchant marine.

The New York Sun, a Republican paper of good repute, had the following, under date of January 24, 1904, attributing the depression to the unsettled condition of labor:

SHIPBUILDING AT A STANDSTILL—LABOR TROUBLES HAVE RUINED THE INDUSTRY LOCALLY.

Not for many years have shipbuilding yards hereabouts had so few contracts on hand as now, owing principally to labor troubles. Over $3,000,000 in repairs alone, according to conservative estimates made by the employers, has been lost to the city, most of it in wages, and even if stable conditions should be restored it would be a long time before the trade could reach the condition it had been in previous to these troubles.

The strikes in the shipyards during the last eighteen months for higher wages or fewer hours of work were ordered, the employers say, without any consideration as to whether they could afford to pay higher wages. With a reduction of the hours of labor came a reduction of the amount of work done in a day, and thus the shipbuilders were in a position of competing with other seaboard cities where wages were lower and where the labor rules were less tyrannical.

Even the overhauling of the trans-Atlantic liners, which used to be done here, is deferred now, on account of the industrial conditions, until the vessels reach the other side.

Five firms have been driven to the wall, two of which are in the hands of receivers. This takes $17,000 a week in wages out of New York. The concerns which have been forced by the labor troubles to shut down are the Townsend-Downey yards, at Shooters Island, and the Morse shipbuilding yards, both of which are still in the hands of receivers; the Morgan Iron Works, the Perth Amboy Shipbuilding Company, and the Marine Dry Dock and Construction Company.

Wallace Downey, of the Townsend-Downey Shipbuilding Company, said yesterday:

"The labor situation is largely responsible for the present dullness in trade, the trouble going further back than the last strike or series of strikes. It began three years ago with the rapid rise of wages, the cutting down of the hours of labor, and the great restriction of the amount of work performed per man. The last is to my mind the greatest factor in bringing about the present deplorable state of affairs, both for the employer and employee.

"It is safe to say that the volume of business has decreased about $3,000,000 in the past eighteen months, which must mean a much greater loss for workmen in this vicinity than it does for the employers."

Another large employer affected by the shipyard strikes said, regarding the building of ships of large tonnage here:

"Until labor conditions are on a more stable footing any enterprise in the way of building ships of large tonnage here is not to be looked for. Labor conditions could be made such as to make it possible to build battle ships here. By this I do not mean that the wages would be cut down to any great extent. I mean that if employers had any guaranty that there would be no labor upheavals for some time and that employees and employers could work in harmony, the business could be developed so that the largest ships could be built hereabouts. Enterprise in this direction, however, would be useless under the conditions which have ruled in the past."

The Merchants' Association of New York City, an organization with nearly 200,000 members in the United States, under date of January 27, 1904, adopted the following, which I desire to read and have made a part of the RECORD:

The Merchants' Association is in favor of the appointment of a commission to carefully study and propose such legislation as will afford Government aid to the development of our merchant marine, exclusively as a product of our own shipyards, but in such form as not to injure or discriminate against other interests. It does not advocate such aid as a requirement of commerce, because commerce has shown its capacity to thrive best under the freest competition among the tonnage of all nations, which induces the lowest rates of freight. That "trade follows the flag" is the merest euphonism, because the slightest acquaintance with commerce convinces us that the carrying flag does not concern the distant consumer, who considers only the quality and price of the wares offered him.

It is, then, purely as an aid to an arm of the national defense that a mercantile marine has any special claim on Government. We have already seen in the Spanish war the need of auxiliary cruisers, scouts, transports, and colliers, and the need of shipyards at numerous and convenient points along our seaboard.

It is idle to claim that legislation has discriminated against shipbuilding in this country, except in so far as the protective tariff did so prior to the liberation of shipbuilding material from its operation and in so far as the present navigation laws impose undue hardship on its operation. Capital in the United States has sought and found more profitable investment in other directions; and as until lately our industries and development were dependent to a great extent on foreign capital, something else must have suffered if shipbuilding had been progressed.

Neither can the neglect of shipbuilding be attributed to the higher wage paid here to labor, because it is admitted that the labor is proportionately better, and is aided by machinery here more than elsewhere. The shipbuilding material being cheaper in this country to-day, labor and material combined, given their character and quality, do not make against us. Plant and organization, however, count for much, and it is against these conditions we must contend until a healthy growth ensues. Whatever may be the reason, it is certain that shipbuilding, except for our coasting trade, has languished, and, under existing conditions, offers no attraction to capital.

In so far, then, as shipyards and a mercantile marine of local construction may be a national need, they are entitled to national assistance.

The Merchants' Association has opposed the subsidy bills proposed to the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses, because neither one of them would accomplish the end in view, and both were so framed that the subsidy provided for would accrue in its greater part to tonnage of foreign construction and assist in the restraint of commerce.

You will doubtless remember the genesis of the bill proposed to the Fifty-sixth Congress. Senator FRYE some years before appointed a committee of twenty-five citizens to draft a subsidy bill. These citizen were, for the most part, owners of tonnage and, for a great part, owners of foreign tonnage. Patriotism being thus confronted with self-interest the nature of the measure proposed was less of a surprise in itself than that it found favor in Congress. The committee of twenty-five meeting just prior to the final short session of the Fifty-sixth Congress was not willing to have the true meaning of the bill expounded to it, as it was explained to Senator FRYE, and the committee resolved that the bill must not only become a law but take precedence of appropriation bills and other vital legislation.

The bill proposed to the Fifty-seventh Congress was more carefully drawn to conceal its true significance. An amendment was so strongly urged to limit its application to United States tonnage that a general clause to that effect was adopted before it was reported by the Committee on Commerce. A simple alteration in its provision for a mail subsidy, however, practically nullified the general amendment, because it prohibited a mail service unless through the admission of the tonnage of the famous shipping trust known as the "international mercantile marine."

Thus in the original bill the Postmaster-General was "authorized" to contract with vessels of the United States for the mail service under subsidy, but as amended he was "directed" to do so. This mandatory legislation would leave him no option to provide for the necessary mail service failing an adequacy of United States tonnage, and the demands of commerce would make it necessary forthwith to rescind the legislation or admit the fleet of the shipping trust to its operation. The activity of one influential member of the shipping trust to influence the action of a shipping organization; the urgent interest displayed in Washington by another influential member of the trust, and the public utterances of its president left no doubt of the correctness of this theory if it was otherwise open to doubt.

The Department of Commerce and Labor, in the Daily Consular Reports for April 2, 1904, on page 11, has the following on German shipbuilding:

As was said at the beginning of the preceding chapter, the moral support of the Imperial Government has done more for the merchant marine than its financial aid. The business interests of the Empire, well-armed with the best educational qualifications, have been the backbone and life thereof. From such sources the enormous amount of capital required to build the shipyards and to construct new vessels has been forthcoming.

Most of the vessels which have been and are being built are not a result of the subventions, but rather of the opportunities still existing for transoceanic carriers.

From these sources of expert evidence the only conclusions that can be drawn are that subsidies are unnecessary and, when adopted, unsatisfactory; that the principle on which they are founded is a vicious one and at variance with free government.

Then, when subsidies have been granted by this Government, notably to the American Line, which has already received a bounty of more than $6,000,000, it is claimed by the management of that line that the profit comes largely from the unsubsidized Red Star Line, owned by the same company, but flying the Belgian flag. If this is true, it settles the question of Government aid.

Our friends on the majority side of the committee assert that the freight paid on our foreign commerce exceeds $200,000,000 annually, which it is claimed is a loss to our people. This is misleading, as more than two-thirds of this sum is on exports, and the freight is paid by the purchaser abroad, who would naturally prefer vessels flying the flag of his own country.

Freights on imports are paid by our merchants and business men, but at low competitive rates. Subsidies, therefore, will not help either class of shippers, as freights will always go where the lowest rates can be obtained.

Mr. William W. Bates, formerly United States Commissioner of Navigation, and author of The American Marine and American Navigation, standard works, fully discusses the rise and fall of our shipping. He shows that under the old system of discriminating duties and tonnage taxes, introduced by the fathers of the Democratic party, our shipping increased, and that when we entered into reciprocal treaties with Great Britain and afterwards with other nations our commerce fell off.

This authority freely and intelligently discusses the various plans proposed for the fostering of a merchant marine, including subsidies, and decides against it as a shipping expert and as an American citizen and patriot. And while he agrees with both sides of the House in the desire to abandon the present "reciprocal," "free competition," "Government hands-off" policies, yet his remedy is not subsidies, but the "trade regulation" under which our once world-famous shipping was built up.

The bill (No. 7056) submitted by the majority of the committee is uncalled for, against public policy, and should not receive the approval of Congress.

The report of the minority, if adopted, will place the whole matter where it properly belongs—with the committee of Congress having jurisdiction of the matter, thus avoiding vexatious delay, unnecessary expense, and bringing us nearer to some definite and satisfactory solution of this vexed problem that affects the nation.

I desire to close my remarks with the following from the minority report of the committee on this proposition and now before you:

OUR PLAN OF RELIEF.

The merchant marine of this nation, in its early history, was built up as if by magic by the policy of discriminating duties and tonnage taxes.

It is the only system which has proved successful.

All others now proposed are at best mere experiments—guesswork.

We see no insuperable obstacles in the way of its present successful adoption.

The navigation interests of the United States languished before the Constitution was adopted, and one of the principal, if not the most potent, factors in bringing about its adoption was the urgent demand for uniform regulations of commerce in favor of our home marine.

In 1789 we were carrying 17 per cent of our imports and 30 per cent of our exports. One of the first acts of the First Congress was to establish a tonnage tax of 6 cents on home vessels and 50 cents on foreign vessels entering our ports, and a rebate of 10 per cent of tariff duties on goods imported in American vessels.

Without going into further details of measures passed, the result of this system was that our marine advanced by leaps and bounds, so that in 1794 we carried 91 per cent of our imports and 86 per cent of our exports in American bottoms. This flattering condition continued in unabated vigor, except temporarily during the war of 1812, until high-water mark was reached in 1825, when we carried over 95 per cent of our imports and 89 per cent of our exports.

On the statute books of the United States the discriminating-duty system still stands in apparent force, but its vitality has been wiped out by a system of trade conventions with foreign nations, by which their vessels are placed on a level with ours in the ports of the United States.

Not to burden this report with details, it may be fairly said these treaties began to take full effect about 1828, and from that time until now our carrying trade has steadily declined. We lost about 1 per cent a year for thirty years until the civil war. It revived slightly after the war, but again drooped and dwindled, and under this system we now carry about 9 per cent of our traffic.

Many volumes have been written about these things, torrents of debate have poured forth, and many are the theories presented for our consideration, but the "short and simple annals" of our foreign carrying trade are contained in the foregoing. Theory may be piled on theory, but the simple fact is, experience proves that a moderate discriminating duty will accomplish what we all want—and no nation can justly take offense.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill because I believe it will bring to the attention of the country the deplorable condition of our merchant marine. When that condition is fully realized, and when the people fully understand what such condition means to the prosperity, the independence, and the safety of the country, I have little fear that a way will be found, and found quickly, to remedy this condition—a condition that is to-day the most alarming in our national life. We once were one of the leading sea powers of the world. Our ships sailed every sea; but to-day our flag is but a legend, a memory in most of the ports of the world.

In 1826 we reached the high tide of our commercial greatness on the sea. In that year our foreign trade amounted to $162,569,799, and of this amount 92¼ per cent was done by American ships. From 1821 to 1842 was the golden era of American commerce upon the ocean. Then our ships entered every port bearing our products, and returning brought the wares of the world to our shores. During those twenty-two years the foreign trade of our country amounted to $4,413,000,000, and of this vast amount our own ships carried more than 86 per cent.

From that time until now our carrying on the sea has steadily declined.

The present condition of our merchant marine is deplorable, humiliating, and discreditable. Last year from New York there sailed for Europe 265 steamships. Of these, only 6 bore the American flag. There sailed from New York to Australia 8, and on not one did our flag appear. From New York to Africa there were 12, and not one American. From New York to China, Japan, and the Far East, 17, and not one American. From New York to South America, 50, and not an American. From New York to Cuba, West Indies, and Mexico, 71; American, 22. From Baltimore to foreign ports, 73; American, 3. From Boston and Charlestown to foreign ports, 74; American, 9. From Newport News to foreign ports, 18; American, none. From Portland, Me., to foreign ports, 6, all British. From Passamaquoddy, Me., to foreign ports, 4; American, 2. From Galveston to foreign ports, 249, and not one American. From Mobile, Ala., to foreign ports, 43; American, none. From New Orleans to foreign ports, 127; American, 5. From Pensacola to foreign ports, 44; American, none. From Alaska to foreign ports, 39; American, 31. From Tampa, Fla., 3; all American. From Hawaiian ports, 15; American, 6. From Port Townsend, Wash., 88; American, 16. From San Francisco, 61; American, 26. From Porto Rico, 37; American, 2. From Philadelphia, 64, and not one American. It seems to me that it is time for that historic old city to sign a new Declaration of Independence.

The total number of steamships engaged in our foreign trade last year was 1,368, and of all that number only 133 bore the Stars and Stripes. But to-day, while we are the greatest manufacturing nation on earth, while we are the greatest agricultural nation of earth, while we are the greatest exporting nation of the earth, while the balance of trade in our favor last year was $400,000,000, while our foreign trade carried in ships for 1903 was $2,240,797,420, yet this mighty nation of ours, bounded by two great oceans, with its great coast line, with its magnificent ports, with its inexhaustible resources, its immeasurable wealth, its tremendous energy, carried but about 5 per cent of this trade. We paid to the foreigner for carrying the remainder the enormous sum of $200,000,000.

It is a well-known fact, stated by the highest authority, that during the Spanish war, even had we possessed another naval fleet, we had not the officers and men to equip it. It is equally well known that our Government was compelled by foreign nations to pay exorbitant prices for inferior crafts during this war, and we all know that there can not exist a navy truly great without a merchant marine, yet this necessary auxiliary to our Navy is almost entirely neglected, while we contribute to build up the auxiliaries of foreign navies $200,000,000 annually. What do these figures mean?

They mean that we actually pay for the benefit of the foreigner a sum ten times greater than the interest on the national debt; a sum equal to all the customs duties we collect; a sum more than twice what we are spending to build up and maintain our Navy; a sum twice as great as we spend to maintain our Army; it is half as great as the entire cost of our war with Spain; it is a sum far greater than all the pensions we are paying to all our soldiers for all our wars; it means that more than a half million dollars each day is paid to foreign labor; that more than a half million dollars each day is taken from American labor and given to the foreigner; it means that a half million dollars in wages leaves this country each day that could remain at home. Not only are we paying this vast sum to foreign labor, but we are training foreign sailors, building foreign vessels that may be used against us at any time in event of war. It means that each year we are placing ourselves more and more at the mercy of other nations.

It means that we are constructing for possible enemies their mightiest weapon, that may at any time be used to our destruction. It means that a tribute is to-day levied upon the American farmer, the American merchant, the American mechanic, the American workingman to build up the nations and navies of Europe. These figures demonstrate that we are utterly unable to cope with any of the great powers of the world. These figures tell an alarming story of our national weakness, of our national danger, national neglect, national humiliation, and national disgrace. What a lie these figures give to our boasted assertion that we are a world power. No patriotic American can contemplate these figures without feeling his cheeks redden with the blush of shame. I hope and believe that the future policy of this nation, steadfast and unswerving, will be that American ships, built by American capital in American yards, by American labor paid American wages, manned by American seamen, flying the American flag, shall carry American commerce. [Applause.]

DECADENCE OF OUR MERCHANT MARINE.

Germany in the last two years, within her own shipyards, has built a greater tonnage than the entire tonnage of this country. And yet Germany only has 208,000 square miles of territory and 53,000,000 people. We have 3,622,000 square miles and more than 76,000,000 people. Germany has about 500 miles of coast line, and the United States has about 10,000 miles of coast line. The State of Washington alone which, it is my privilege to represent, has more than three times as much coast line as the German Empire. On Puget Sound alone there are better ports, better facilities, more and better material for shipbuilding than in all Europe combined.

The following table of tonnage for deep-sea commerce strikingly shows the humiliating conditions of our shipbuilding at the present time as compared with some of the other nations:

	Tons.
United States	873,000
Italy	1,180,000
France	1,480,000
Norway	1,660,000
Germany	2,960,000
British Empire	14,800,000

This table shows that the United States actually has to-day 108,000 less tons engaged in foreign commerce than she had ninety-four years ago.

PUGET SOUND.

Puget Sound is greatly interested in having American vessels carry our foreign trade. We are perhaps more vitally interested in building up our merchant marine than any other portion of our country.

On a beautiful and calm May morning away on the farther shores of the Pacific, just as "rosy-fingered morn" had first tinted the tropical sky, a line of battle ships moved slowly into Manila Bay. Then the roar of red-throated cannon startled the nations of earth. The map of the world was changed in an hour. The Stars and Stripes had moved forward halfway round the circle of the earth and was unfurled forever in the portals of the Far East. That day set the seal of future greatness upon the Puget Sound country. That day destined Puget Sound, that great inland sea with the most magnificent harbors of the world, as the gateway to the Orient. That day brought to our very doors 500,000,000 people of the Orient, anxious and waiting for our products.

This nation to-day controls practically one-half of the coast line on this side of the Pacific. With our new possessions, if we are not criminally negligent of our interests, we will to a far greater extent than any other nation control the future commerce of this greatest ocean. The most potent factor in the future commerce of mankind will be the trade with China. This mighty nation with her face to the past, stupid with centuries of superstition, must soon be awakened by the advance of modern civilization. Even as she is now her foreign trade amounts to a million dollars per day. Then what will it be when the mighty latent energy of her mighty people has been turned into modern channels. The future demand of China will control the markets of the world, and if we do our duty we will control the future trade with China.

The great opportunities offered by this oriental trade have not escaped the notice of the commercial world. Japan has already seized the opportunity, and her ships come regularly to our shores. The Boston Steamship Company has a great fleet of magnificent vessels engaged in this trade between Seattle and the Orient. James J. Hill, with that clear vision that has stamped him as one of the great men of his country, as one of the great men of this age, seeing its future possibilities, has just launched for this trade two monster ships, prophetic of this mighty trade, of 30,000 tons that will be the greatest that have ever floated the seas.

THE GREATEST AMERICAN PORT.

A few years ago we had practically no shipping, but for ten months ending October last we sent from Puget Sound to foreign ports 1,112,000 tons, and I take pride in stating that American ships carried more than two-thirds of this amount. Last year we sold to the Philippines $614,000 worth of products and bought from them more than $1,000,000 worth. Puget Sound to-day has the proud distinction of being the only port in the entire country where more tonnage is carried in American than in foreign ships. Blot Puget Sound shipping from the list, and little would be left of the paltry 9 per cent of our products now carried under the American flag.

In 1900 our exports were $12,000,000; in 1901 they were $20,000,000; in 1902 they were $36,000,000. Judging by the last three months, in 1904 they will be $50,000,000. This is the most rapid growth of any port in America, and this is but the beginning. Immediately tributary to this Puget Sound country are the greatest wheat fields that the world has ever known. Not only that, but the great wheat fields of the Middle West send their wheat and the States of the South send their cotton to our wharves.

The greatest and most valuable forests of the continent surround us; but you can not carry the produce of the South and of the Middle West to tide water on the Pacific and then return east with empty cars. But when the cotton of the South comes to Puget Sound and when the wheat of the great Middle West comes to our ports, the cars as they start eastward go loaded with lumber and shingles. The State of Washington has enough standing timber to-day to supply the entire civilized world for years to come. Last year the State of Washington furnished 50 per cent of all the shingles used in this country. They go entirely across the continent. To-day the Puget Sound shingle prevents the rain from falling upon the just and unjust alike from ocean to ocean. The Puget Sound country has solved the mighty problem of modern transportation—loaded cars both ways. This fact is of tremendous import to every raiser of wheat and cotton in the United States. It is of supreme importance to the shipping interests of our section. No other port of the Pacific possesses this advantage. It makes certain our supremacy in the oriental trade.

Thus we stand to-day between the greatest demand, the Orient, and the greatest producer, the United States. We are the gateway to the great oriental trade. So certain as this nation lasts, so certain as the law of supply and demand continues, so certain as the countless millions of the Orient continue to eat, so certain as wheat and cotton continue to grow, so certain will there pass through Puget Sound one of the greatest streams of commerce that the world has ever known. The limit of this trade no man can measure, and it will increase with the years.

WHO SHALL CARRY THIS TRADE?

The vital question to-day is who shall carry this trade? James J. Hill said a few days ago that when his new ships were brought into this trade he would carry a barrel of flour from Minneapolis to Hongkong for 80 cents, but he stated that under present conditions he doubted if he would long be able to continue his boats under the American flag, and added that if he could not do business under the American flag he would do it under another flag.

The American ships on Puget Sound had to compete at our own wharves until the late war with a line of Japanese ships built by cheap labor and operated by cheap labor. At Vancouver, directly on their way to the ocean, they have to compete with a British line of ships built by cheap labor and operated by cheap labor. Not only this, but this Japanese line and this British line are each subsidized by their respective Governments to the extent of more than $300,000 per year. Against these unequal conditions the American lines are making a brave and heroic struggle to hold their part of this great trade until the nation can come to their assistance. They must soon receive help, go under another flag, or be driven from the seas. Shall we, then, by national aid place them on equal terms with other nations and carry our own commerce, or shall we simply transport our products down to the water and there sit down and gaze out on the old ocean and await the pleasure of foreigners, as helpless as if the great Pacific were still an uncharted, unsailed, and unknown sea?

SHIPBUILDING ON THE SOUND.

At Seattle we are building one of the great battle ships of the Navy. We have upon the sound a navy-yard, the only one on the Pacific coast where battle ships can be docked and repaired, and this dock, by law, when not in use by the Government may be used by others. We have several shipyards; we have a great shipbuilding industry; but not in our yards nor upon the Pacific coast, not even in the entire country, has a keel for foreign trade been laid for the last two years. We have at our doors the greatest coal fields west of the Father of Waters. We have the best timber, the best climate, the best ports for shipbuilding in the entire world.

To-day one of the most beautiful of all waterfalls is riveting the mighty steel plates upon one of Uncle Sam's great battle ships. The energy of our mountain streams, if utilized, would furnish sufficient power to turn all the wheels in all the shops necessary to build all the ships that will ever travel the seas, yet, with all these great natural advantages, with all the mighty commerce that is to be carried from our ports, our shipbuilding industry is rapidly declining, and unless something is quickly done, the fires in the furnaces must die, the stroke of the hammers must cease, capital be invested elsewhere, and labor seek other employment, while we pay the foreigner to build ships and carry our products.

IN CASE OF WAR.

Our foreign trade, our foreign markets, our country's prosperity, is entirely at the mercy of foreign nations. During the little Boer war England withdrew sufficient vessels from our trade to increase freight rates on many products more than 150 per cent. It affected the entire trade of the country and was felt by every industry. On the Pacific coast it reduced the price of wheat 25 per cent. During our ninety days' war with decrepit old Spain we had to rely on British vessels, to a great extent, to carry our troops and supplies. Even to-day, in time of peace, we are compelled to send our supplies to our little army in foreign ships. What American is not ashamed and humiliated by this fact? What, then, would be our condition in case of war between England and Germany, or between either of them or any other great power?

Our foreign trade would be vanished from the seas, our foreign markets would be blotted out, our products would rot in field and factory, labor would be forced into idleness, there would be beggary and want, panic and disaster beyond description and beyond comprehension. Industrially we would suffer all the devastations and horrors of war. That such awful disaster may come upon us at any time is entirely within the range of probability. What, then, would be our condition if we were to become engaged in a mighty struggle with some great nation? Were our condition fully understood, the statement of this question alone would be sufficient to arouse the self-interest, the pride, the loyalty of every patriotic American to such an extent that he would demand the immediate construction and control of our merchant marine regardless of the cost. The very statement of this question to-day is sufficient to appall every lover of his country. Let us hope that a lesson so terrible shall not be necessary to compel us to perform our duty.

SUBSIDIES PAID BY OTHER NATIONS.

One-half of the ships that travel the seas to-day are sailing under heavy subsidies. For forty years England has paid as subsidies an average of $5,000,000 annually. Last year she paid $6,000,000. This year she will pay more. In addition, she is going to build a great line of fast steamers to be run between this country and England and make it a gift to a company to operate. Germany pays to her ships as subsidies about $3,000,000 annually, France over $7,000,000, Austria-Hungary over $1,724,000, Spain $1,629,000, Japan, that little country of the Orient that only a few years ago emerged from mediæval darkness, is paying annual subsidies of more than $2,500,000, and as a result she has a magnificent fleet of steamers and is carrying a large part of our commerce on the Pacific. Shall we not profit by the example of others? Shall their experience be no light to us? Shall their success teach us no lesson?

Why are these vast subsidies paid? They call it for carrying the mail, but in reality it is paid to put their products in the markets of the world and to build up an auxilary to their navies.

Millions are to-day being expended to drive our flag from the ocean. Can it be possible that it is worth more to foreign nations to keep our flag from the seas than it is worth to us to keep it on the seas? Shall we, then, hesitate to spend millions if need be to keep it there?

CAUSE OF THE PRESENT CONDITION OF OUR SHIPPING.

Why does the United States, with all its wealth, with all its great foreign trade, with all its energy, fail to carry her part of the commerce of the seas? It is simply a question of wages and subsidy. It costs one-fourth more to build a ship in this country than it does in Europe. Why? Because of higher wages. It costs one-third more to operate an American than a foreign vessel, so far as labor is concerned. Why? Because of higher wages.

I need not stop to cite illustrations, examples, or statistics to prove this assertion, for evidence would have no weight with those who would deny the statement. Add to the price of labor the subsidies and you have the causes that have driven American ships from the ocean. We must overcome this disadvantage of wages, this disadvantage of subsidies by national aid and that quickly, or our shipyards will become desolate places and our flag will entirely disappear from the sea.

FREE SHIPS.

The world's history shows that those who have built ships have navigated them. If we do our own carrying, we must build our own ships. Why is the shipbuilding industry in this country to-day languishing? Because capital can not be profitably invested therein. As long as the world remains as it is men will not engage in an undertaking in which there is no hope of reward. The remedy for this condition advocated by the gentlemen on the other side of the House is registry for all ships bought by American citizens wherever built, or, in other words, their remedy is "free ships." No more is there reason why we should employ foreigners to build our ships than that we should employ foreigners to build our houses.

If we were to make it possible for cheap labor from Europe to come here and construct our buildings, the entire country would protest, and justly so, against the outrage. American labor would rise, as it should, and sweep into eternal oblivion any party that would for a moment advocate such a policy. But the advocate of free ships does more. If the foreigner should come into this country to do our work, we would at least get a part of his wages for supporting him while he was doing it; but when he builds our ships we do not feed him or clothe him or shelter him. We receive the finished product of his toil, wrought in other lands. Of all competition that cheapens American labor, that destroys American prosperity, this is the most dangerous, the most deadly, the most inexcusable.

The doctrine of free ships is the infamous doctrine of free trade on the land applied to the commerce on the seas. Fortunately for this country, fortunately for the wage-earners of this nation, the record of ruin wrought by the last Democratic Administration has made this doctrine "a hiss and a byword" so odious to the American that no man anywhere within the confines of this great Republic has the assurance to stand up and defend this doctrine of disaster and death. For its advocates to disguise it by another name does not make it smell more sweet. [Applause.]

OUR ONLY UNPROTECTED INDUSTRY.

Situated as we are between two great oceans, with our extensive coast line, with our vast interests, it is our duty to assert our rights on the sea as much as it is to protect our interests in our immense domain on the land. This nation has given protection to every industry on land and sea except only our foreign commerce. We have built canals. We are undertaking a great system of irrigation. We are going to unite the waters of two great oceans. We have subsidized our rivers and harbors. Each year as surely as the rivers run to the sea, so certain does there flow millions from the National Treasury into rivers and harbors. We have protected our manufacturing, and we are the greatest manufacturing nation of the earth. The manufactured product of this country is vastly more than that of any other two nations, and the labor engaged therein is the best-paid labor of its class in all the world.

We protect farming, and we are the greatest agricultural nation on earth. The products of this industry last year was more than $4,000,000,000, and the labor engaged therein is the best-paid labor of its class in all the world. We protect mining, and this industry produced last year more than $1,000,000,000, and the labor engaged therein is the best-paid labor of its class in all the world. We have subsidized railroads by money and by land grants of more than 200,000,000 acres, and we have the greatest railway system and the cheapest rates on earth, and the labor engaged in this industry is the best-paid labor of its class in all the world. We have protected our coastwise and lake shipping, and it is the cheapest transportation on earth, and the labor engaged in this industry is the best-paid labor of its class in all the world.

We have protected every industry except the foreign merchant marine, and every other industry has prospered and flourished beyond those of any other nation in all the world's history. While forty years ago we carried three times as much foreign commerce as we carry to-day, yet to-day we have four times as much commerce as we had forty years ago. This, our only unprotected industry, is the only one in which American labor and American capital has practically no part. It is the only one in which foreign labor and foreign capital has driven out American labor and American capital. It is the only unprotected industry, and it is the industry that charges the highest rates, gives the poorest returns on the investment, and pays the lowest wages of all American industries.

THE BENEFIT TO LABOR.

The workingmen of this country are more deeply interested in this question than any other class. Thousands of foreigners are to-day performing labor that should be done at home. It is the workingman who is losing most by having our commerce carried by others. It is the workingman whose work and wages are taken from him. This loss of work and this loss of wages affect the laboring class more directly than any other. If we were to pay $50,000,000 annually in subsidies and that payment would cause us to build our own ships and in them carry our own trade, this sum, vast as it is, would return to us more than threefold each year in wages alone.

To build our own ships and do our own carrying would give investment to more than $700,000,000, and would give employment to 500,000 men, who would earn more than a million dollars in wages each day. Even this is not the limit that would be given to the employment of labor. Labor must fell the trees in the forest; labor must move the timber and operate the mills to manufacture the lumber; labor must dig from mines the coal and the iron for the furnaces and forges; labor must transport these products from mine and mill to the shipyards. The farmer must furnish bread and clothing for all these countless toilers. This question touches every interest, every class, and every section.

This is a question that directly interests all who by the sweat of their face eat bread. It is a question that enters into every family; that comes to every fireside in America. It is one of the highest purposes, one of the most sacred duties of the Government, to give its work and its wages to its own. Yet each day's sun sees this nation take from American labor a million dollars in work and a million dollars in wages and give them to those of another land, owing allegiance to another flag.

ALL BENEFICIAL LAWS REPUBLICAN.

Every law that has been written upon our statute books in forty years that added to the prosperity, the greatness, or the glory of our country has been made and written by the Republican party in opposition to the Democratic party. By laws written by the Republican party in opposition to the Democratic party we have become the greatest manufacturing, the greatest mining, the greatest farming, the greatest selling, and the wealthiest nation in all the world's history. In all industries upon land we stand supreme, and the Republican party, in spite of Democratic opposition, is going to write a law upon our statute books that will restore the ancient prestige and greatness of our merchant marine, that will cause our own ships to plow every sea and our flag to fly in every port of the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

REMEDY.

The whole country is awakened to the imperative necessity of aid for our merchant marine. Even in the Middle West, where a few years ago there was much opposition to national aid being given, they have become aroused to its need, and our committee has been receiving communications from many of the commercial bodies of that great section urging us to enact some law that will bring relief. That something should be done is no longer a question. The only question to-day is, How shall we do it? What method should be adopted? To ascertain a remedy is the principal object of this bill. I am in favor of anything that will give us American ships to carry American trade, provided it be not done at the expense of some other American interests. If discriminating duties will accomplish this result, then I am in favor of discriminating duties. If subsidies will produce this result, then I am in favor of subsidies. If the two combined will produce this result, then I am in favor of the combination. As the gentlemen on the other side of the House have expressed themselves as opposed to certain measures, so I, too, am opposed to some proposed remedies. I am opposed to buying ships built in other countries—to free ships. I am opposed to any system that gives another nation work that can be done at home; that gives investment to foreign capital that should be given to American capital. I am opposed to any plan that will send our money abroad. I am not in favor of any scheme that would remove the tariff upon articles the like of which are produced in our country.

I am not in favor of trying the delusion of free trade either on land or sea. I oppose any plan that will reduce American wages. I am eternally and everlastingly opposed to any scheme—in any shape, in any form—that will not give the investment to American capital and the employment to American labor. [Applause.]

Free trade! Free silver! Free ships! The Democratic trinity of darkness! No longer dare its worshipers bow down to the first two except in secret; and when we have an opportunity to tear off the mask of the third and expose it in all its hideous deformity, we will compel them to recant as to it as vehemently as they are to-day denying free trade and free silver. [Applause.]

THE RESULT.

To build up a merchant marine sufficient to carry our own trade is a question that interests the entire country. It would increase our exports. It would widen our foreign markets. It would reduce freight. It would increase the price of what we sell. It would decrease the price of what we buy. It would build up our shipyards. It would increase the demand for labor. It would increase the wages of those who work. It would keep at home more than a half million dollars every twenty-four hours that now goes to Europe. It would give to American labor more than a million dollars each day.

It would benefit all trades, all classes, all sections. It would return to the nation manyfold every dollar given it. It would make us independent of every other nation on earth. It would make our flag more revered at home and more respected abroad. It would give us an auxiliary that will make our Navy really great. It would protect us in war and add to our wealth in peace. It would make the great Republic truly a world power—the mightiest nation ever builded by the children of men. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATIC OPPOSITION.

The gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us that they are opposed to this bill. We being for this bill, of course they are against it. Had we been against it, they of necessity would have been for it. To wait until the Republican party has taken a position and then oppose it is the highest intellectual feat that the Democratic party has performed in a third of a century. Their opposition to this bill will create no impression in the minds of the people that it should not be passed.

If there is one thing that characterizes the Democratic party, it is its overwhelming desire to advise and its eternal failure to perform. As I have sat in this House day after day and listened to the ever-ready, never-ending, gratuitous advice coming from the other side of the House, I have wondered what has given birth to this assurance, this self-asserted wisdom. Why are the gentlemen so confident that they know all things? Why should a party that brought upon us the horrors of the last Democratic Administration, that went hysterical over free silver, a party that has learned nothing in forty years, a party that has forgotten nothing in forty years, a party that has not kept a promise in forty years, a party that has not been right in forty years—why should this party assume that with it wisdom shall perish from the earth? [Applause.]

The people of this country only once in forty years have listened to Democratic promises and followed Democratic advice and placed that party in power. Then that party revised the tariff; it enacted the Wilson law, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has so eloquently condemned, and that law withered our prosperity as do the hot winds of the desert the blossoming harvests. That party applied to the land the doctrine they now advocate for the sea. During that Democratic Administration our national debt increased a half million dollars each day. Each day we lost a half million dollars in foreign trade. During that Administration the value of farm products decreased more than $500,000,000. The business of this nation in two months after the enactment of the Wilson law decreased 6 per cent. Immediately upon the passage of that law fear, distrust, and panic paralyzed the great industrial system of our country; banks closed their doors; business houses assigned; the balance of trade was against us; bonds were issued; capital withdrew from the fields of legitimate enterprise into secret places; labor was forced into unwilling idleness; we had deserted mills, smokeless factories, silent machinery.

We had tramps and beggars and industrial armies, starving women and children. In the midst of plenty, with bountiful crops rottening unharvested in the field, at a million hearthstones sat famine pitiless and cruel. Two million men were out of employment and begging for work—begging for an opportunity to earn bread to feed the starving lips of those they loved. William McKinley was elected, the system of protection was restored, and in eight months 1,000,000 idle men had gone to work.

What has the Democratic party done to command confidence that gives it a right to assume to advise the American people? The Democratic party asks always to be judged by the future and not by the past. It always asks to be judged by its promises and not by its performances.

That party in fifty years has added nothing to progress; nothing to the sum of human happiness; nothing to the cause of liberty; nothing to freedom; nothing to the glory of its country. It always goes into partnership with calamity. It feeds on disaster and fattens on despair. The only time it has had control of this country during this generation it shut the door of industry and clothed labor in rags. It fought under the dishonored banner of free silver; it subscribed to the driveling stupidity that a nation can create value by law—that the Government could stamp a lie upon 50 cents worth of silver and make it a dollar. It opposed keeping our flag in the Orient, and advocated that it be lowered in retreat and trailed in the dust of dishonor.

The Democratic party always has its face to the past and its back to the future. It never sees an opportunity until it is past, and never gets on the right side of any issue until it is settled.

Such is the record of this self-constituted keeper of the country's conscience and the country's welfare, the oft-defeated, discouraged, disorganized, disgraced, divided, decrepit old Democratic party. It stands to-day without an issue, without a principle, without a policy, without a platform, without a leader, and without hope. The highest possible praise the Democratic party can bestow upon this bill is its opposition. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question upon the amendments and upon the bill to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] moves the previous question upon the amendments and the bill to its final passage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw the previous question for a moment and yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LIVERNASH] to offer an amendment, after which I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LUCKING] for the same purpose; and then I will renew the call for the previous question.

The following amendment, offered by Mr. LIVERNASH, was read:

Amend by striking out the final period of the amendment of section 2, inserting a comma, and adding thereafter the following:

"And also what change or changes, if any, should be made in existing laws relating to the treatment, comfort, and safety of seamen, in order to make more effective the seafaring calling in the American Merchant Marine."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment myself.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be received. The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In section——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, we desire to know what became of that amendment. Was it voted upon?

The SPEAKER. It is pending.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In section 2 of the bill, after the word "legislation," I offer the amendment to insert the words "if any." Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the previous question on the bill and amendments to the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It was the impression on this side of the Chamber that we would not vote until 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 10, after the word "legislation," insert "if any."

Mr. LUCKING rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Michigan for an amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan to send up his amendment.

Mr. LUCKING. The amendment is at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the following amendment will be offered and considered as pending. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 2 insert:

"Provided, That no plan or policy shall be reported or recommended which involves the payment of subsidies or bounties from the Treasury of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Upon the bill and amendments to the final passage the gentleman from Ohio demads the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My understanding of the nature of the rule was that it merely put this bill upon the Calendar as a privileged question; but there was nothing in the rule that precluded the right of amendment.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Ohio, under the rules of the House, is proceeding to move the previous question——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. GROSVENOR, The time has been occupied on the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let us vote at 5 o'clock. There will be no objection to the previous question then, I assure the gentleman. My understanding was——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please suspend.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I thought the gentleman yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. Ah, but the Chair had the floor, answering the gentleman's question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am always glad when the Chair has the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio yielded to the gentleman from California [Mr. LIVERNASH] to offer an amendment, which he did. Then, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LUCKING] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] each offered an amendment, which amendments are pending; and upon the amendments and the bill to the final passage the gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question.

Mr. LUCKING. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Seaker, a parliamentary inqury. Why was it that any unanimous consent was necessary in order that the gentlemen should offer their amendments? There is nothing in the rule cutting off amendment, and the previous question has not been ordered.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but the previous question is demanded. It is in the power of the majority to order it otherwise. The special order does not affect it. We are proceeding under the rules of the House.

Mr. LUCKING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LUCKING. I wanted to state that the previous question was called rather suddenly, and there are several gentlemen who want leave to print.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I shall not object to any leave to print if it be upon the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. LUCKING. That is all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me to finish my suggestion—I ask unanimous consent that general leave to print be given for five days upon the subject-matter of the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. I object, Mr. Speaker, and I want to state the reason for doing it——

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

[Mr. BAKER continued to address the House.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be seated. The Reporters will omit everything that has passed since the gentleman was called to order. The question now is on the previous question.

Mr. LUCKING. Mr. Speaker, my request was not acted upon, to allow two or three gentlemen, who specially ask it, including myself, leave to print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair awaits the pleasure of the House. If the gentleman from Ohio withholds his demand for the previous question——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not understand what the gentleman says.

Mr. LUCKING. I ask unanimous consent that I, "Mr. LUCKING, of Detroit," may have permission to print my remarks on this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will join with the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], and I will make no objection.

Mr. LUCKING. There is also Mr. BURTON, of Ohio, to whom I had agreed to give ten minutes, but who was called away. My time has been cut off; and Mr. BAKER, of New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that himself—and he accepts the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, that Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington be included—be permitted for five legislative days to file his remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SPIGHT] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN], who are upon the committee, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER]——

Mr. BAKER. I do not want it on this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. If this is to be included, I shall have to demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask for the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 175, noes 141.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let us have tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands tellers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 125, answered "present" 14, not voting 87, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, April 24, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.:

Eternal and everliving God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for that deep and ever-abiding faith which Thou hast implanted in the hearts of men, and which has inspired the true, the noble, the brave of every age with patriotic zeal and fervor, bringing light out of darkness, order out of chaos, liberty out of bondage, and thus contributing here a little, there a little, to the splendid civilization of our age. Especially do we thank Thee for that long line of illustrious men who lived and wrought, suffered and died that our Republic, with all its sacred institutions, might live. And to-day we are reminded of that host of statesmen whose names have been connected with the Congress of our nation, where deeds of heroism have been enacted no less onerous than on the field of glory. And, gathered here to-day in memory of those whom their colleagues would immortalize, may the heart guide the tongue that truth may live to inspire those who shall come after them, and God grant that we may live so pure, so true, so noble, that men will rise up and call us blessed, and passing on we may find a glorious reward awaiting us in the realms of eternal day. And pæans of praise we will ever give to Thee, in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer for adoption the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for paying tribute to the memory of Hon. MARCUS A. HANNA, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of the exercises of this day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in the very brief period that I shall occupy I shall attempt to do nothing more than merely to record myself as one of those who have assembled here to-day to pay the last tribute of loving respect to the memory of Senator MARCUS A. HANNA. The Senate of the United States has heretofore met for the same purpose, and has paid affectionate tribute to the memory of their late comrade. The legislature of the State of Ohio, which so short a time ago that it seems only yesterday met to pay to him the highest honor that they ever paid any man in the history of the State of Ohio, have within a few days again met to pay to him the last farewell. The country has spoken, and there is but little left to say. But upon this solemn occasion, when we of the House have met to add our voice to the voices of those who have spoken with eulogy of MARCUS A. HANNA, I count it as a privilege to be permitted to say one brief word which, although but too inadequate, as I well realize, is none the less sincere and heartfelt.

In all the eulogies that I have read and have heard pronounced—and they have come from the most eminent men of the country—the thing that has most impressed me, what has seemed to me to be the dominant note, has been that of admiration for Senator HANNA not only because he was a great statesman and a great and dominant figure in American business and in American politics, but an admiration for his qualities as a man; and I know of no one in American history who so preeminently combined in his make-up those qualities which the American people call "manly." His tremendous popularity among the people is all the more remarkable because he was not of a type that usually make the popular idol. He was not a great general, though he served honorably in the Army of his country. He was not a great orator of the kind that sway men's souls and passions, though he was a speaker of great clearness and of immense force. He was not the father of, in the sense of having his name inevitably connected with, any great public policy. It was not because of those qualities which usually appeal to men's hearts that the American people loved him. It was because they saw in him the typification of that simple, honest, energetic American manhood that has made this country the greatest among the nations of the earth.

Since the sad day in which this great man passed away men of all creeds, of all degrees, the high and low, rich and poor, have lifted up their voices in eulogy of Senator HANNA. Great orators have delivered eloquent orations; great writers have contributed literary gems; but to my mind the most eloquent and touching of all was that unspoken eulogy, if one may be permitted to use such an expression, of the people in the city of Cleveland, men and women, who stood for hours in the snow, with the thermometer at the zero point, waiting to get one last look at the features of their well-beloved fellow-citizen; those people who lined the streets and with bared heads and aching hearts watched the funeral cortege pass on its way to the final resting place; those miners all over the State of Ohio who at the hour of the funeral laid aside their picks and shovels and joined with those far away in a last tribute of farewell to the man who had proved himself their friend.

To myself the death of Senator HANNA came as a personal loss. I believe that the first serious thought that I ever had of entering upon a political career came as a result of a conversation I once had with him in this Capitol, shortly after his election to the Senate, in which he said that he thought it the duty of every young man to whom it was in any way possible to take an interest in the political questions of the day and to ally himself actively with one of the great parties.

Since that time he was always ready with advice and counsel, and his unvarying kindliness to me I shall always remember with gratitude and with pride. It was my good fortune to be especially intimately associated with Senator HANNA during the last campaign in Ohio, when as chairman of the speakers' bureau I had charge of his routine and of the arrangement of his meetings, and I have often thought that his tremendous labors at that time may have contributed to hasten his last illness. With an energy that seemed almost superhuman he insisted in filling not only those appointments which were made for him by the committee, but also in adding more in response to requests that the committee had refused, and he did so, I have always thought, not so much with the desire to gain votes, although he was devoted to his cause and intensely partisan, but because he wanted to oblige his friends. The name of MARCUS A. HANNA will doubtless go down through history as one of the great men and unquestionably the most forceful individual figure of his day; but his friends will keep his memory green, not only because he was a great leader and a great statesman, but because he was a simple, kindly, big-hearted American gentleman, who always kept his word and never went back on a friend.

Mr. CASSINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, my first knowledge of Senator HANNA was secured years ago before he became particularly active or prominent in State politics, his attention at that time being directed almost entirely to the coal and iron business, with which he was identified.

At the time I refer to I merely knew him by sight and as one of the influential business men of the city of Cleveland, Ohio. My impression of him at that time was that he was a man of a stern and distant nature, in whose presence I, at least, would not feel comfortable. I also entertained the opinion at that time that he was possessed of but little sympathy for what is known as the "labor element." These opinions of mine were strengthened by newspaper references to him after his entrance into and prominence in national politics as the manager of Mr. McKinley's political interests.

One day, after my election to Congress, in passing his office with a Democratic Member of this body, my companion suggested that we should go in to see Senator HANNA, to which I objected, being largely influenced in my judgment by the impressions I have just referred to with reference to his stern character. However, we went in and I am glad to say that the kindly manner in which he received us entirely dissipated the erroneous opinions that I had previously formed concerning his character.

After that interview I could readily see why he had become the great political leader that he was. His sturdy steadfastness to friends, his kindly nature, and his recognized ability were the magnetic influences that drew men to him and held them there.

His antagonism to the labor element was frequently commented upon, in the section of the country where I reside, during the period of his early attention to State politics, but as the sphere of his influence broadened into national politics this belief disappeared, and for some time prior to his death he held a place in the esteem of the laboring class equaled by few, if any, men in public life. On the day of his burial at his home city the evidences of the high esteem and regard in which he was held by all classes, especially by the labor class, were striking features of that sad occasion.

The Democratic party recognized him as an able political antagonist, one who not only enjoyed the confidence of the substantial and corporate interests of the country but also that of the great army of wage-earners.

The bulletins describing his condition during his last illness were watched with interest by persons in all conditions of life without regard to party affiliations, and when the announcement of his death came they all mourned the loss of a distinguished citizen of our common country.

The nation mourns the loss of a foremost citizen and Ohio the death of one of its ablest sons, and I, as an American and an Ohioan, wish to add my voice to the universal expression of regret in the death of MARCUS ALONZO HANNA.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to honor, among others, the memory of MARCUS A. HANNA, late a citizen of Ohio and Senator of the United States. I knew him for many years, and our relations were always cordial and pleasant and remained so up to the time of his death.

Senator HANNA was a successful business man. He did not, until 1884 and when he came into the field of politics, attract public attention. From that time forward he was in the public eye. Possessed of a keen intellect, exerting a power to make and then to take advantage of political conditions and circumstances as they arose, he soon engrafted his individuality upon his party in Ohio, which made it possible for his appointment by the governor as a Senator of the United States to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator Sherman and until the meeting of the legislature. I shall always remember his remarkable contest before that legislature when he sought an election for the full term, and in which he was successful.

Senator HANNA came to the Senate with the prestige of his party and as the personal friend of President McKinley. He rose rapidly in that body and in the confidence and esteem of the nation, possessing a strong body, a mind quick of conception, honest and manly, exercising good business judgment, and bringing them all into play, he soon became a power in that body and a recognized leader of his party. He was in all respects a safe man, his advice was good, his motives pure, and essentially he became a factor in shaping legislation of great consequence to our nation. His friendship was sincere and lasting. He made enemies, yet in his loyalty to friends he never wavered. He was willing to share all the burdens as well as the joys of friendship. It was justly said of him that could he have had a voice as to the eulogies pronounced upon him he would not countenance false praise nor wish to have ascribed to him virtues he did not possess.

Senator HANNA was but human, so that at times he erred. Then his criticisms of men and measures were rather severe, but he had so many good qualities that so strongly impressed themselves upon you, that one soon lost sight of the other ones. He was not a brilliant man in the full acceptance of that term, yet blended in him were all the elements of an able man, and those elements he exerted for the public good. He was distinctively a man of the people. His death was untimely, for his eye had not been dimmed nor his intellect impaired—cut down while in strength and usefulness.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players:
They have their exits and their entrances;
And one man in his time plays many parts.

Senator HANNA played a leading part in life's drama. He gave full measure to his country, and left behind a character that time in its fleeting race will not soon efface. The world is better because he lived. His party will miss a wise counselor, and the nation mourns his loss.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, every man, large or small, is in greater or less degree the creature of circumstances, and Senator MARCUS A. HANNA was no exception to the rule. He was possessed, however, of those qualities of mind and heart which, under ordinary circumstances, make success certain. He was to a very great degree what is known as a self-made man. He was, in the first place, a successful business man, and accumulated a large fortune even for his day and generation, when fortunes are measured in millions. His fortune was acquired by honest means and methods. He had courage—that which is sometimes called "nerve"—and sound business judgment. All of his accumulations came as the result of legitimate profits from business conducted along legitimate lines. He was in no sense a speculator except as the element of speculation enters into all business enterprises. His strong personality, his courage, and his self-reliance made him a leader in business as he afterwards became a leader in public affairs.

From a very modest beginning as clerk in his father's store, he became the head of large transportation companies and manufacturing and mining concerns.

He enjoyed a high reputation for honesty, integrity, and fair dealing. His word was his bond, and it is said that neither was ever questioned. He was widely known and as widely respected as a business man long before he became a politician and a statesman. No man, perhaps, ever commanded the confidence of the business men of the country to a greater degree.

I had known of him many years as a business man and as a Republican in politics before I came to know him personally in 1895. He was then deeply interested in the nomination of William McKinley for President. He had assumed the management of his preconvention campaign. Mr. HANNA himself was an ardent protectionist.

It was thought almost universally at that time that protectionism and not free silver would become the dominating or paramount issue. He believed McKinley to be the logical candidate of the party. He believed also in McKinley, and he loved him as a brother. Mr. HANNA was then in the full strength of matured manhood. He had had wide experience in organizing and handling men. He had never held political office, but he was not a novice in political methods. He had always taken more or less interest in public affairs, and twice, at least, had he been elected a delegate to the national convention. For some years he had been rather a prominent figure in the rather factional strife which prevailed in the State at that time.

Here is where my acquaintance with Mr. HANNA commenced. Afterwards, up to the time of his death, I met him frequently and thought I got to know him fairly well. With the commencement of the campaign which resulted in the nomination and election of McKinley as President began what may be termed his public career. It was short, but eventful.

From the very beginning he became prominent, and his prominence increased to the end. Perhaps no one short of McKinley himself exercised a greater influence in public affairs. During the early part of this period he was hated by millions. During the latter part many of those who had hated him had learned to love him, and millions were singing his praises. Few men have been more viciously misrepresented and villainously slandered by those who spoke without knowledge or a desire to obtain it. A man with less strength and fortitude would have sunk beneath the load. He lived to rise triumphant over all, and when he died there was not one whom the nation could not better afford to lose.

In organizing the campaign for the McKinley nomination he displayed the same qualities which had made him successful in business. Energy and method characterized all his work.

The high character of McKinley and the fact that he stood as the embodiment of the protection idea contributed much to his nomination, but the consummate organizing ability of Mr. HANNA made the victory an easy one. After the nomination he became the chairman of the national committee, and it was during this campaign of 1896 that he displayed those masterful abilities which challenged universal attention and fixed his status as the greatest political organizer of his day. I believe the campaign of 1896 the most remarkable in our history. It was from its inception a campaign of education. The issues were clearly defined, and they were real issues. The discussion of them aroused much of class feeling. Mr. HANNA was a wealthy man. He was known to be a close friend and adviser of the candidate for President. He at once became the target for the grossest abuse and the most vituperative slander.

Among other things, he was characterized as a man of corrupt methods and a cruel, tyrannical oppressor of labor. While nothing was further from the truth, he was in no position to make a personal defense. By the close of the campaign it became as settled conviction in the minds of millions of men and women that these vile statements were true. So persistently were these slanders circulated that in his State they were for a time generally believed by those who did not personally know MARCUS A. HANNA. When McKinley became President it was his desire that Mr. HANNA should be called to the Senate. It is not difficult to see why the President wished to have him there. He had been McKinley's friend and adviser, and no one had had better opportunity to discover his true worth.

He was first appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by the selection of Senator Sherman as Secretary of State. Afterwards he was twice chosen to represent his State in the United States Senate, each time under circumstances and conditions differing widely from the other. Preceding each election he had received the indorsement of the State convention of his party. His candidacy was the dominating issue in each campaign, and I think it can be fairly stated that the difference in the results in these two very spirited contests fairly measured his growth and advancement in favor with the people of his State.

The first election was carried by only a few thousand; the one occurring six years later by more than 100,000, an unprecedented majority in Ohio. Notwithstanding his ante-election indorsement in 1897, it became uncertain that he would be elected Senator. The business men of the State arose in their might and demanded that the expressed will of the party at the polls should be respected. I do not believe that another such meeting was ever held, composed entirely of the people of a single State, as that which assembled in Columbus in January, 1898, to protest against the effort then being made to prevent the selection of Mr. HANNA for Senator. There were at least 10,000 politicians and business men, all representative men from every part of that great Commonwealth.

All this time President McKinley was perhaps the most popular and the man most beloved in his party and Mr. Hanna was his trusted friend. Undeserved abuse, criticism, slander, and libel, persistently indulged in, aided factious opposition in creating this anomalous political condition. If Mr. Hanna was seriously disturbed by these things his friends generally did not know it. I saw him frequently during that intensely bitter struggle which immediately preceded his first election. He was always composed and cheerful, with never an unkind word for those who were opposing him.

In his election to the United States Senate he found increased opportunity to make himself known and understood by the people. He had for a long time been a large employer of labor, and all those who had been associated with him, as employees or otherwise, were his friends. The erroneous impressions as to his character could not last. They had no solid foundation on which to rest. Laboring men grew to trust him and to believe in him. While he differed as to important matters with many of those known as "labor leaders," they became, as a rule, exceedingly well disposed, because they knew him to be friendly, frank, fair, and courageous.

At the time of his death there was probably no more popular and beloved man in the nation. He was exceptionally loyal to his friends, and they were strongly attached to him. It has been said frequently that he was not an orator. This depends on what we adopt as a definition for oratory. All agree that he was an original thinker and a clear and convincing speaker. Speaking of his career in the Senate, one of its members says: "He took his initiation pitted against eighty-nine old gladiators of debate, and he who is willing to do justice to this man's fame must admit that from his entrance here until his death, on all questions political and commercial, he maintained his place in the very first rank of the strongest debaters in the Senate. No ordinary man could have done that." Another speaks of him as a powerful and convincing speaker. One thing is certain, he became popular as a public speaker, and the people turned out to hear him in large numbers in whatever part of the country he chanced to be.

He obtained his early education in the common schools, but his grasping and retentive mind put him in possession of a store of useful knowledge that enabled him to understand and deal with intricate business or state problems.

He was one of the most considerate and obliging of men; at least, that is the way he impressed his friends. He at once inspired confidence and affectionate regard, and when he passed away the tears that were shed were the evidence of unfeigned sorrow.

His time in the Senate covered a period of about seven years. He was always helpful in shaping policies and determining legislation. Few men with so short a service can be said to have accomplished so much. It is perhaps too early to assign to Mr. HANNA his proper place among the great men that Ohio has given to the nation, but we can rest assured that history will accord to him high honor and that he will be held in grateful remembrance by a patriotic people.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, when the lives of great men come to a close, it is well that, in accord with historic custom, we pause to honor their memories and think upon the institutions, the movements, of which they were a part. It were an interesting task for some idle hour to imagine what our body politic would be if such men as the late lamented Senator HANNA were endowed with earthly immortality, what changes would result if their influence and power continued to grow forever. Could democratic institutions long continue to flourish if such were the law? An All-Wise Providence has ordered it otherwise. As one after another of the strong towers of the nation's citadel are laid low, we witness a never-ceasing spectacle of change. It is said that if there were no moon to attract the waters, there would be no ebb and flow of the sea; and the stillness which follows the death of a great man resembles nothing so much as the pause of the waves if the moon were swept from the sky.

When we analyze the current of our national affairs and seek the causes which explain it we find somewhere in the shadows of the bordering hills great men who, like the mothers of legend and song, keep watch at the springs of life. They mold the needs of men and supply the foods to satisfy them. They plan and project their plans into the political and industrial life of the nation. They initiate and control the policies of government. They become bureaus for the wisdom and power of the land, so that other men must work and speak through them. Such a center of influence and power was Senator HANNA. But, sir, Senator HANNA held a position in our national life in many ways unique. He represented as possibly no other man of the present day the close relation between commerce and national politics. If it be true that "commerce follows the flag," there is a sense in which it is also true that "commerce is being."

It sometimes happens that commercial interests are established before political relationship. Commercial relations sometimes make political relations expedient and even necessary. Indeed, sir, I hold it true that commerce follows human taste and need, and the flag, commerce. Where on the face of the earth can human tastes change without affecting the currents of our foreign trade? Where are the needs of men altered by civilization or uncivilizing influences without producing demands which commerce alone can supply? And what nation is there which does not protect its ships and its citizens and seek friendly political relations to increase their wealth and straighten their commercial paths through the seas? Senator HANNA'S life, I repeat, in a peculiar way illustrates this relation.

Called home from college after a single year by the sickness of his father he devoted himself after his twentieth year to mercantile life. In an incredibly short space of time he became one of the captains of business in and about his home city in the State of Ohio. His growth was phenomenal. He disposed of his grocery trade and invested in coal and iron. His factories and foundries multiplied; he became a master of the iron trade; he studied coal mines and bought coal lands; he studied the iron trade and bought iron lands and boats to carry the ore. He built the first steel ship on the Great Lakes and became intimately associated as a part owner of those great and productive iron mines of Minnesota at the head of the Great Lakes. Men toiled for him from the Alleghenies to the Rockies.

When the labor unions began to organize he invented the union of coal operators. He became a director of the Globe Ship Manufacturing Company, of Cleveland; president of the Union National Bank, of that city; president of the Cleveland City Railway Company; president of the Chapin Mining Company, on Lake Superior. He interested himself in theaters, and was the proprietor of a successful playhouse; and in all these varied business experiences he did not fail to discover that the policies of the Government, the laws of industry and trade, determined to a very great extent the possibilities of our national commercial growth. Consequently he became interested in the political platforms of parties, in party leaders, in industrial institutions, and in commercial legislation.

Friendship for William McKinley, which began in a lawsuit in which these two men took opposing sides, grew into a warm admiration, and in 1896 he began directing the campaigns which resulted in the nomination, the election, and the reelection of that immortal patriot and statesman to the Presidency of the nation. Senator HANNA, as everyone knows, was chairman of the Republican national committee from 1896 to his death, and was himself elected to the Senate of the United States from the State of Ohio in 1897, and reelected to that position only a few short weeks prior to his death. He grew in wealth not so much because he prized riches as because he was born with tenacity of purpose and an instinct for mastery. He toiled desperately, but he toiled with his head more than with his hands. Probably there was not another man in America who possessed so accurate a detailed knowledge of the many branches of business life in which he was interested.

The instinct for mastery over the conditions of life was powerful in him, as it is in all strong men. He loved freedom from the limitations that make life meaningless to countless thousands, and sought freedom for himself and his friends alike. It was for mastery and independence that he built ships and operated mines. It was for this, too, that he sought political position and influence. He had discovered that commerce and politics are not distinct and separate, and that to be master in the one sphere a man must enter the other. His interest in tariffs, the uplifting of the merchant marine, the construction of the isthmian canal, his deep concern for the relations between labor and capital, and his loyal and efficient aid to the political interests of his great friend, William McKinley, were part and parcel of his determination to be free. His motives were simple and manly; his methods were the methods of that straightforward business honesty in which, as a youth, he was trained.

I know of no just measure of the ability of men save the degree to which they achieve mastery over the conditions of life. He is strong who makes the forces of the world pour their treasures into the coffers of the institutions he represents. No breezes blow which do not fill his sails. For him all knowledge, all moral influence, and all wealth exist. If there are obstacles, he overcomes them; if there are battles to be fought, in the end he wins them; if there are friends to be supported and great causes to be sustained, he is sufficient. Judged by this standard, Senator HANNA was one of the greatest men of this great age. No weakness of will, no faltering on the threshold of action, marked his life; no maudlin mind wandering rendered him incapable of prolonged and concentrated mental effort. Wherever he was and whatever his task, he was master of himself and his resources. Who among the many men with whom he was associated was more alert and receptive than he? Who was quicker witted, more fertile in planning, or more prompt in action? Who was truer to his friends and party? Who was more fearful to his enemies?

Senator HANNA'S philosophy of life was simple and practical. He may have lacked many graces of conduct; he may have lacked the tact to accomplish his ends without sharp clash of opposing forces; but when the day of battle came and the fight was on, he was farseeing, courageous, prepared. For Senator HANNA'S life was not an ideal ore, but—

> Iron dug from central gloom
> And heated hot with burning fears,
> And dipped in baths of hissing tears,
> And battled with the shock of doom
> To shape and use.

Neither the graces of solitude and meditation nor the capacity for intrigue and diplomacy which characterize more complex matters can explain his power. His creed was simple; his life was filled with usefulness, and no Gibraltar rock ever stood more firmly on its broad base than he.

In politics he was guided by the sublime feeling of his party, and he possessed that essence of all the virtues—sincerity. Methinks I hear that gruff apostle of sincerity, Thomas Carlyle, mutter from his tomb, "I care not what creed a man professes, so he be sincere." The truth is, our departed champion served his friends and his country with every throb of his mighty brain, and this was nowhere so well illustrated as the way he took defeat. He knew when he was whipped. Incapable of shaping his judgment merely to suit the currents of popular opinion, he was, nevertheless, of all men, quick to abandon his own private position and adopt the plans of his party when once they had prevailed. He was, again, the common-sense business man in politics, content to do his best both as counselor and as committeeman for the cause he had espoused.

And where, in the history of America, have two men stood so closely and beautifully together through a period of so many years as MARK HANNA and William McKinley? In the presence of the martyred President, HANNA was always charmed and chastened. That friendship buoyed up his spirit in dark and trying hours. Thinking over their splendid loyalty, we find ourselves suddenly mindful of that other friendship, immortal in Hebrew legend and song—the friendship of Jonathan and David. "Then Jonathan and David made a covenant, because he loved him as his own soul. * * * Then said Jonathan unto David, Whatsoever thy soul desireth, I will even do it for thee."

Here, if anywhere in the world, were two souls knit together by a common idea of manly living and the common conviction as to wise and beneficent political policies. More forceful, perhaps, than his more honored friend, HANNA had devoted himself without reserve to the other's political interests, and by a "stoop of the soul, in bending upraises it, too," accomplished his generous task. At the time of that awful calamity which laid the President low upon his bier, HANNA suffered a wound from which he never recovered. It aged him perceptibly; and let us hope that those two modest, daring champions have entered into that perfect friendship of all the good and great.

I can not close my remarks without saying that I profoundly admire HANNA'S simple solution of the labor situation of to-day. He believed in organization on both sides of that question. He was, perhaps, the first great industrial leader to organize, in 1879, a coal operators' union. It was his way of meeting the union of miners; but he believed from the first that such organizations should be undertaken, not in the interest of capital on the one side and in the interest of labor on the other, but on both sides for "the mutual benefit of the employer and the employee." It is the Golden Rule applied to industrial relations.

In the later years of his life, when approached by the officers of the Civic Federation for aid in settling labor controversies, it was this simple practice and aim which appealed to his judgment and won his support. The people of America all know how valuable were his direct efforts, guided by this rule, in settling industrial disputes. In the February number of the National Magazine he is reported as saying:

> I am finally convinced that it (the Civic Federation, whose motto is the Golden Rule) is the object to which I desire to consecrate the remaining years of my life. * * * I am sure that the American people will sustain a policy, based upon the highest moral and social impulses, which will eliminate the passionate prejudices that now exist between capital and labor.

I know of but one standard by which to judge the wisdom of any philosophy—"by their fruits ye shall know them;" and in all the literature of social theory I find but one theory of human action which is at once adequate and practical, the theory that conduct should aim at and realize the common good of all concerned. In the greatest of all poems of the nineteenth century and the most philosophical poem of all literature Goethe represents Faust as setting out upon the search for a moment of complete happiness. Mephistopheles agrees to bring him to such a moment. They have formed a contract, signed in blood. If Mephisto succeeds, Faust will surrender his soul as a forfeit. The devil tries him with the love of a woman, then with wealth, then with art and culture, then with power and influence in the state.

From each experience Faust turns away disappointed; but at last, when he has grown old and weary of failure, he becomes absorbed in draining a marsh and turning it into a public park. It is a labor for the good of the public in which he has abandoned forever the hope of satiating his own Titanic passions, and behold! to his own amazement he is supremely blest, profoundly content. In joy he cries out to the moment when he sees his task complete, "Oh, still delay—thou art so fair." Mephistopheles at once claims the forfeit of Faust's soul, but all in vain. Faust has wrought his own salvation in an humble effort to uplift the world.

Let us believe that in this simple faith lies the solution of all our problems. Let us hope that with education and social progress a glad day may dawn when all men may live by this creed. We find, sir, in the life of the late Senator HANNA an example of the wisdom of that ancient Nazarene who said: "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." We are glad that we knew MARCUS A. HANNA, and we are thankful for the memory in whose ample courts the dead become our sceptered sovereigns, whose spirits rule us fromt heir tombs.

Mr. BEIDLER. Mr. Speaker, it is probable that my acquaintance with the late Senator HANNA, commencing as it did over thirty years ago, was a longer acquaintance than that enjoyed by any other Member of the House. And living in the same district with him, and being engaged in the same business avocation as he, we were frequently thrown together in business matters long before he gave any great attention to politics. In January, 1885, over nineteen years ago, he submitted to me a proposition to enter into business relations with him, which, however, was never consummated. In July of 1900, after the national convention held in Philadelphia, and after I had received the nomination for Congress, I called on him at his office, and he gave me the warmest and most cordial welcome, saying that he would assist me in every way in his power, which he did, and upon my election he assisted me in all matters pertaining to the district which I have the honor to represent. My recollections of Senator HANNA are of the most kindly character.

I will leave it for others, whose eloquence better fits them to do so, to speak of Senator HANNA'S achievements in business and public life. I shall pay my humble tribute to him as a man of many sterling qualities of heart and brain, for he was a man of heart as well as of brain. The same qualities that contributed to his success in business life made him a strong and commanding figure in national public life. To those who had known him only since his memorable part in the nomination and election of the late and lamented President McKinley, Mr. HANNA'S rise seemed almost meteoric. But his was not a comet-like flight upward. From early manhood he was an active political worker. He did not spring from business life into successful political life with one bound. He started at the bottom of the ladder, working in the wards and precincts of Cleveland as the ward and precinct workers work to-day. It was there that he learned the rudiments of politics, and there that he learned the lessons which contributed so largely to his success in the great arena of national politics. He learned to know and to understand men.

Senator HANNA was a fighter. His business, as well as his public life, was one long fight. He was a man who preferred defeat after fighting to victory gained by the tricks and wiles of demagoguery. His political life was largely a repetition of his business life. His methods of reaching results were the same. He made enemies right and left, but while these enemies hated him, they also feared him, and at the same time admired him. They admired in him the very qualities that made them his enemies, and when he was called to the life beyond, there was not one who did not grieve deeply and sincerely. Senator HANNA made enemies because he was a strong man; and when a man, especially in public life, is strong he arouses strong enmities. A man can afford to have enemies if they admire him. The same qualities that made enemies for Senator HANNA likewise made him friends. No man had more loyal friends.

Senator HANNA was conservative; he believed in treading the paths that were tried and safe. His warning to the people of this country to "stand pat" was not a warning to stand still. His now famous "stand pat" meant that the people should continue to enforce those policies that have brought peace and prosperity to the land and happiness to the people. In his public and in his business career he never stooped to the tricks of the demagogue. Demagogy he fought as he would have fought a pestilence. In seeking public favor he never pandered to public prejudice and passion, but fought to overcome that prejudice.

Senator HANNA was a leader, and that statement needs no corroborative testimony from me. He was a leader because he had strength of purpose and strength of character and because he had the implicit confidence not only of those who were his friends, but of those who were opposed to him.

As I have said, Senator HANNA was a man of heart as well as of brain. His heart was big and it was tender. Strong himself, he sympathized with the weak. No friend of Senator HANNA ever had a better and truer friend than Senator HANNA. He would fight for his friend's honor as quickly, and perhaps more quickly, than for his own honor. He sympathized with and extended a helping hand to those who were in distress or suffering.

Senator HANNA has gone, but his influence will remain and continue to grow with us. As a man he has left an impress for good upon all with whom he came in contact. As a public citizen he has left an impress for good upon the entire country. The world is better because he lived in it, and more can not be said of any man.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, MARCUS A. HANNA is dead. Another great man in the zenith of his fame and power of good has reached his journey's end.

Again in the marvel of life we are standing rapt and helpless in the presence of the profoundest mystery of human destiny—death—the precipice that marks the deepest, darkest tragedy, the end of each and all.

Our friend has gone, and on its ragged edge we stand in listening love, waiting for the sound of a voice that comes back only in the trouble of the waves that break upon the fretful shore.

But to me the greatest mystery is life.

The flower unfolds in bursting bud and falling leaf.

It lingers for awhile in sweet perfume, to fade away and then to bloom again.

What shall we do? What words can we say?

There is the sunshine and beauty, a glad song in the sky, the bee's quiet hum of rich content in a wealth of sweetness, and then the cruel thorn, many struggles, the torn flesh, and a tear.

There comes a far cry, a tree falls in the forest dim and dusk, the flower is crushed, and over the débris the world moves on.

But the fragrance of the flower that has been will forever hang round the hearts that will be.

The grave is the mother of universal pain and every human sorrow, but in its mysterious depths it also cradles the birth of every high resolve and the love of bird, and beast, and man.

Again the mystery—in the alchemy of life the rainbow of infinite love is only seen through the moisture of a tear.

How unutterably barren and cheerless would this world be without its monumental grave, without the huge and thoughtful silence of all its mighty dead.

The stringless lyre, the voiceless songs immortal, they fill the halls of memory with their harmonies, wondrous sweet and kind, that tell of all that is and of all that man would like to be. They tell us of all the noble doings, the joys and sorrows, the ecstacies and grief, the agonizing frailty, and the victories of all the good and great since time began.

They sound the sublimest symphony that was ever touched and played upon the harp of a thousand strings in the love of hearth and home and wife and child and friend.

And we are born again to nobler things in the longings of a softened heart.

Yes; it is too true. MARK HANNA has left us, after having enriched the world with an honest, faithful, sincere life, to return no more.

He needs no words for fame, no apologies for rest.

He grandly fought and serenely died in the full fruition of his highest powers and noblest thought, in the splendid harvest time of the nation's greatness.

He lived to see the end of all he had worked for and dreamed of.

He lived long enough to watch the shadows fall at noon by the bedside of his dearest friend, the nation's martyred hero, the kindest, gentlest, tenderest memory of the world, the idol of his manly heart, and the type and flower of an American Christian gentleman.

With him he had lived to see the culmination of all their hopes, financial stability, exalted citizenship, American victory, expanded glory, and commercial supremacy.

McKinley's gentle spirit took its flight, his troubles ended then, and in the dusk of twilight MARK HANNA wandered on a while, with a great burden pressing down his heart, till at last he, too, fell asleep.

And now his labor's o'er.

They have joined each other, through the darkness and in the dawn, beyond the mystery of life and death.

And we are left to pay a tribute to ourselves in the laurel wreath we place upon their tomb.

Death is always sad, and in its pathos comes the thought—after all his struggles and his triumphs, his kind acts, illustrious deeds, the things done and the things he would have liked to do—why could not he have remained with us yet a little longer, in the deserved praise and friendly admiration of the many millions of his fellow-men who loved him living, and who love him now, with head bowed down in speechless grief for their good friend gone.

Honesty, sincerity, and manly courage are the pillars of the State.

No true work was ever wasted, and since the world began no true life has ever failed.

It is an endless thread running through all eternity.

The spirits of men never die; they live forever, and walk abroad forever among the children of men.

If you fail, you wrong everybody.

If you fill your niche and fill it well, you are a hero.

And in the precursored fulfillment of life's problems there are no degrees of heroism.

In the immortality of human achievement there is no death for an honest faithful life.

There never was a grave dug to smother in its bosom the sunbeam of a heart throb.

There never will be a night black enough to enshroud the luster of a star-led thought.

Every brave and loyal act presses Time so close it dulls his busy scythe.

And MARK HANNA filled his niche complete.

He was a loved and loving man, sympathetic, upright, and absolutely honest.

In the precious thoughts, the noble images, and the spotless character left behind, he has given to the world the richest, rarest legacy of any man's work and worth.

He was faithful to every trust of life—true to himself and friend. And above all that he has done which may live after him, he possessed the one great elemental virtue that makes men eternal.

He was part of the universe, brother of the air, the sea, the soil, and every man, however humble, was his brother.

His brain was warmed by the rich red blood from the heart.

And he had a heart to feel and know that all flesh and blood are human; that each poor, struggling soul has the same hopes, the same joys and sorrows, and that their hearts yearn for friendship and bleed at scorn and contumely the same as his—a heart that beat in sympathy with every human being that toils with arm or brain.

Through all his days it was oak and "stainless to the core."

Through all his days and nights it throbbed for the poor and weak.

And on this blessed day we consecrate to him, all over the broad land, in a million lowly homes, MARK HANNA'S name is spoken soft and low by men and women who work for bread—he was their friend.

Mr. Speaker, after all is said and done, in the far-off, mystical future, that will be his chiefest glory.

Some day the subtle influence of his name will be a potent spell to bring together in terms of understanding and bonds of peace the lives of men who will work for each other in wedded harmony.

He was a man of splendid courage.

Honesty and sincerity refused to bend the suppliant knee in deceiving utterance, and that bred conflict.

Bitter conflict born of passion and prejudice, as old as the great round world, the heritage of every great man.

Some men are tall enough to cast a lengthening shadow far beyond the horizon of their little day.

Great enough to be maligned and misunderstood in their generation.

Brave and strong enough to become the target for the envenomed shafts of envy, malice, and human littleness.

Virtuous and broad enough to inflame the jealous heart of all the meanly wise and feebly good with impotent slander.

But the grave ends all.

The rust of steel mingling with pathetic dust to nourish the vines and flowers that kindly cluster around the tomb of a worthy man.

No man must be measured by an act or a year.

He should be measured by his whole life, by the tendency not of a day, but of all.

Struggle as we may to peer into the future we are but finite.

As to the ultimate judgment of greatness in any man, time and events are the final arbiters.

All we can do now—all that we care to do now in our affection is to cover his resting place with the flowers of our continuing friendship, to pay to his greatness, as we know it, the tribute of an appreciation that lives beyond the grave.

He was a great leader, a man of superb executive ability.

But I shall always remember him best for the splendid qualities of his heart.

Honesty, sincerity, and friendship filled the life of all who knew him with sunshine.

He was successful in everything he undertook, but money could not spoil him, nor fame and power pervert him.

He believed, through very instinct, that a kind act was brighter than gold, more enduring than the stars.

He believed that in the cross and crown of life and death we are nearer to God as we draw closer to man.

That there is no pearl ever born in the deep sea's deepest mystery, no sun-defying crest that ever hung on beauty's brow, no star that lights the wanderer's path of doubt and fear, no word of praise, no sparkling gem of jeweled joy, that could ever vie with the light of a friendly eye, with the luster of the moistening drop that lingers down a manly face for another's sorrow.

Fame may die in a day, but the heart it will live on forever.

He was a kindly, loving, generous, manly man, true to life, true down to the very gates of night. My friend Harry S. Chester, of Indiana, has beautifully written a little poem that tells in simple pathos of the parting of two great men—of a parting in the purple twilight on the ever-widening shore, where the stream of HANNA'S life was emptying in the sunset sea.

A FEW WORDS FROM THE HEART.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You touched a tender spot, old man, when you called personally to inquire after me this a. m. I may be worse before I can be better, but all the same such "drops" of kindness are good for a fellow.

Sincerely, yours,

M. A. HANNA.

DEAR SENATOR: Indeed it is your letter from your sick bed which is touching—not my visit. May you very soon be with us again, old fellow, as strong in body and as vigorous in your leadership and your friendship as ever.

Faithfully, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

You touched a tender spot, old man, you touched a tender spot;
These little drops of kindness help a fellow out a lot.
God bless the sweet expression, for it came from out the heart,
With all the deep affection that a friendship can impart.

"God bless you, dear old fellow, for you struck a tender chord,
As true in wealth of beauty as our human hearts afford.
May you be with us years to come is all I wish for you,
My dear old fellow, from a friend, most faithfully and true."

How grand if all the world were blest with such a human strain,
How many hearts o'erburdened now would have surcease from pain;
"Old fellow" and "old man," ah, these expressions from the soul,
Would drive out bitterness and hate and put love forever in control.

The world, our country, is greater and grander in his life, and we his friends are braver, better, truer, kindlier men in his death.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, no man goes out of the world alone. A thousand souls take flight at once, yet is each transfigured in his own sphere, and we stand transfixed, some gazing up whence he is gone, some looking only at the place made vacant. Every great man who dies makes death easier for those who follow.

Seneca said: "He is a great man who is willing to die when life is pleasant to him."

How long shall a man live 'tis not for him to know.
How well shall a man live is all his own to show.

The greatest solace in the loss of our friends is that we have had them. And sweet memory forbids that we should bury our friendships alive in the graves of our friends.

All that was mortal of MARK HANNA has been borne away out of sight, but the immortal lingers and abides in our hearts. His sphere was not limited by State or nation; it embraced all mankind. We had not to wait for death to sanctify. Long before it came he had made his record. Men had come to know his worth, and the fitting words of eulogy that have since been spoken but voiced the thoughts that were already in our minds.

Those who knew him best saw in him a big-hearted man with red blood, whose every impulse was genuine, whose every thought was clean, whose every act was generous, and whose public life was a model of American patriotism.

Though coming late into the political world, he brought a large business experience and a ripe judgment to his new field of labors. Untrammeled by hackneyed conventionalities, he cut loose from old political methods and hewed out a new path to victory. He sought his ends by directness and not by subterfuge. He was accomplished in the arts of persuasion and won votes through conviction.

Was he your friend? Then well you knew
His friendship was unfeignedly true;
And no reservation mocked the relation.

It may not be said that he was faultless, but it can be said that he was never false. He may have erred, but all the world loves and forgives the man whose great human sympathies at times o'ertop and sway his judgment.

And now we say that he is dead. What do we mean? Only that he has taken the one short step from earth to heaven. One short step from life to life eternal. One short step from the mortal to the immortal. The one short step that sooner or later must be taken by one and all.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, life comes to us without our asking, and that peaceful sleep which, with all the wisdom of the ages, we have not yet been able to fully solve or look upon without some lingering dread or heart quiverings, and which, for want of a better or more expressive term, we call "death," will come to all, whether we crave its coming or try to ward it off.

To all intelligent existence it seems there is some life work, great or small, for each to perform. Prominence is achieved by many in various walks of life. Some grow great in war, others in statesmanship, others in diplomacy, others in ecclesiastical fields, others in science and the arts, others in the business world, and still others in what is sometimes termed the "humbler walks of life;" but in all and through all there seems to be an eternal fitness of things, and we can not avoid, try it though we may, the feeling and conviction that all our life work, energies, and efforts are in some manner unknown to us; in some mysterious way, at least, influenced if not marked out for all.

During my terms of service in Congress our flag has on various occasions floated at half-mast over the Capitol building. During this time twenty Senators, one Vice-President, and eighty Members of the lower House have answered the last roll call, fallen at their post of duty while serving their country and constituencies in their respective capacities. Some of them thus falling asleep with their official robes about them had achieved such prominence as to have become world known; others had acquired national reputations, and still others are remembered for their hard work and splendid results in a more humble and limited sphere; but all have received the encomiums of their people and words of commendation and praise from their colleagues in the halls of Congress. Each one has filled with credit the little space allotted him, and their memories are cherished by an appreciative people and the friends they knew in life.

On the 14th day of September, 1901, our flag fell to half-mast by reason of the death of President McKinley, taken from us by the hand of an assassin, we know not why, at what appeared to be the noontide of his usefulness. He left us mourned by the nations of earth and loved by the people of our whole country; but his works live after him, and his memory will be cherished in the hearts of his countrymen for all time. McKinley lived through periods of history making, and his name is written, in words which can never be effaced, on the brightest pages of the history of those times. When his body was being carried to and tenderly placed in its windowless apartment at Canton, Ohio, business throughout the entire country ceased and silence reigned. No grander evidence of the feelings of the great heart of this nation has ever before been exhibited. He left an example of honor, integrity, unswerving devotion to duty, and an exalted patriotism worthy of the commendation and emulation of all. Throughout the future history of this country the memory of William McKinley will live—live in the hearts of our people, unbesmirched and unsullied, and his acts, works, and efforts will stand as beacon lights to which others may look with profit in the days to come.

February 15, 1904, our flag again floated at half-mast as the whispered words were passed from lip to lip that "Senator MARCUS A. HANNA is dead." Self-made, as we call it, Senator HANNA'S life was a busy one. Born in New Lisbon, Columbiana County, Ohio, September 24, 1837, he forged his way by honest effort and hard work to business prominence in a busy world. He attained wealth by honest effort, business intelligence, and level-headed sagacity. He accomplished this not by pulling others down, but by applying business principles and availing himself of the opportunities which his country afforded. What Senator HANNA did in a business way others with the same energy and perseverance may accomplish in this grand Commonwealth of ours. By his indomitable energy and untiring efforts he builded a business monument in life around which his thousands of employees have cast their garlands of approbation, and over the cold sods which cover his remains to-day they are dropping their tears of sympathy and expressing their regrets that one of their warmest friends has passed away.

While always active in politics in a limited sense, yet not until 1896 did he take such part in political affairs as to make him a national character and a prominent figure in political life; but from the time of his selection as chairman of the Republican national committee Senator HANNA'S name was known throughout the world. A Republican from principle, he stood unhesitatingly, unswervingly, and uncompromisingly for the success of the policies of his party, believing fully, as no one now questions he did, that the success of these policies were better calculated to advance, build up, foster, and improve the conditions of our people and country than were the policies advocated by any other party seeking success at the hands of the voters. He devoted his time and great abilities to the advancement of those principles and achieving success for the policies which with all his heart and force he advocated. Our country to-day has a brilliant record of the success achieved under his guidance and masterful management.

Many may envy his accomplishments, but does anyone now doubt the sincere and earnest belief he entertained in the benefits which would accrue from the success of the principles he advocated? The American people are noted for doing justice to ability, intelligence, and principle, even though the mead of praise may for a time be deferred, and to-day Senator HANNA'S memory receives the reward of praise which his life work deserves.

I often feel that 'twould be better far to cheer by words of praise and encourage by acts of commendation the efforts, work, and accomplishments of friends while yet they tread the paths of life, struggling and laboring in the interest of all, than wait till after their life work is completed and then scatter flowers o'er their windowless tombs and laud their virtues, their abilities, their labors, and their patriotism, when their ears are closed to all the sounds of encomiums and praises which then, and so often only then, are expressed.

No one is perfect; all have their faults, their failings, their shortcomings. We do not expect perfection here, and since this is the universal law, the mantle of charity should be borne by every individual, ready at all times to be thrown about the shoulders of anyone when criticism or calumny is directed against him, before he exercises the right to seriously criticise or impugn the motives of his friend. Before criticising, would it not be more generous and eminently more charitable to hesitate, and say, "I may be mistaken; he may be right; before passing judgment I will investigate?" And after this is done we all can say, "'Twas better far to take this course than wait till after death to determine, and then strew flowers of eloquence over the cold and cheerless apartment to which we have consigned the body of our friend."

As wanderers in a world which, in the light of developing science and discoveries, is as yet but little known, something continuously whispers to our inner selves that "'Tis not the whole of life to live, nor all of death to die." Into each life, whether among the civilized or uncivilized, there comes a feeling, bidden or unbidden, some longing for a future, some kind of a conscious existence after the walls of earth's charnel house are broken down. Shall we say that this is but a dream? If but a dream, why should our intelligence be always haunted with it? I prefer to believe that instead of dreams such feelings are realities, inspired by that part of our being which to mortal ken is yet unknown.

The mystery of life has never yet been fully solved; perhaps 'tis better thus. A veil is hanging 'twixt this and that we know not of, through which we can not look and feast our eyes on visions beyond, but glintings reach us at every turn in life and lead us on in thought, with hope which lingeringly looks and longingly waits for some bright rays, until we feel that at some time, somewhere, and in some sphere, which as yet we can not explore, we'll meet again the wanderers who have glided from us here. May we not still fondly hope that as earth's beautiful visions fade and what we now call death has kissed our eyelids down, we are then but entering a brighter sphere and higher existence than this, where we are now enveloped by shadows and all our paths are sprinkled with our tears.

From earth's life Senator HANNA has disappeared. His sphere in life was well filled; his duties well, faithfully, honestly, and honorably performed. The world is better for his having lived in it. He worked for the betterment and upbuilding of mankind, and, as he said, was ready to devote the remainder of his life to the working out of the great questions of labor and capital, which will still be vexing subjects for years to come; but it was not given him to continue and complete this work. He outlived the slurs and vituperations which in the earlier part of his active political career had been hurled at and heaped upon him, and to-day partisan politics are hushed as with bowed heads, intelligent men, members of one of the greatest legislative bodies of any government on earth, bound together with the warmest feelings of friendship, inspired by love of patriotism, always ready and willing to recognize real merit wherever found, and ever commending noble aspirations, join hand and heart in offering their tribute of respect to his memory and commending his earnest, unselfish, and patriotic life work to those who come after him.

Peace to his ashes! Honor to his integrity, his ability, his sterling manhood! He left us mourned by an appreciative people. May we all profit by his example.

While to Senator HANNA we to-day utter our faltering good-by, yet when the sunburst of eternity dawns upon us, we hope, we expect, and we believe that somewhere, at some time, and in some higher sphere we'll meet again.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, there is, it is said "a tide in the affairs of man which taken at the flood leads on to fortune." Many of us are painfully reminded that with the tide the opportunity passes away like ships that pass in the night, unseen, unheard, never to return again. Mr. HANNA, while a young man, active, energetic, observant, and watchful, saw his opportunity, recognized it, seized it, used it, and with it rode the tide at its flood from humble surroundings to the exalted place that he held in the hearts of the whole American people; and while on the highest wave of his popularity the waters receded from under him, and he was buried from our sight forever. Over his faults all are content to spread the mantle of charity, but his good deeds are the heritage of the whole people, share and share alike.

I did not know him intimately, but well. I first knew him personally in 1896 at the St. Louis convention, and met him often, always, however, in matters of politics, from that time on. I took part, in a humble way, in his memorable campaign for the United States Senate, when the will of the people was triumphant after a most prolonged and exciting effort. His rise in politics and his preeminent position in the affairs between capital and labor was from that time uninterrupted.

His last campaign was not only brilliant, but the most marked personal and political vindication of a man in American politics. His majority, as shown by election of the members of the general assembly, exceeded by many thousands the majority over the Democratic candidate for governor, being almost unanimous. His friends were fearful of his exertions, lest he might not be able to bear up under the strain; but the same energy that had marked his whole career was called into exercise, but the effort was too much. His work was done. The end had come; and may his good deeds ever live as an inspiration to America's youth and the possibilities to be obtained under our great free institutions.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, to the tributes which are paid to the memory of one of the most distinguished of American citizens permit me to add a word expressive of my admiration for his character and my deep respect for him as a man. It is not my purpose to review his life. That has already been accurately and eloquently done by those who knew him intimately and well. "Paint me as I am," said Oliver Cromwell while sitting to young Lely. "If you leave out the scars and wrinkles I will not pay you a shilling." Could Mr. HANNA now speak to us he would indorse that request. Many lessons of wisdom may be learned from his successful and useful life. It was a remarkable life, a marvelous career that the ceremonies of this day commemorate.

Great intellectual power, a lofty aim and purpose, a rich nature, an enlightened conscience, perfect integrity, and a kind and tender heart won for Mr. HANNA, in a marked degree, the respect, confidence, good will, and admiration of the American people. His life and character are a striking illustration of the spirit, the tendencies, and the possibilities of free institutions. He was a great and good man, and his goodness was the crown of his greatness. He was great in intellect. A clear, discriminating, logical, and consecutive thinker, he grappled successfully with every political, social, and economic problem that claimed his attention. He was accustomed to collect and hurl his whole mental force against the citadels of truth, and carry them, as it were, by storm.

With the capacity to master every situation completely, he had, in a rare degree, the ability to make his views convincingly clear to others. He was gifted with remarkable intellectual powers. He was great in word. He appealed to the intelligence, the judgment, the reason, and the conscience of his hearers, and his wise utterances always rose above prejudice, above passion, above personal considerations, to the sublime heights of philosophy whose logic is invincible. Perhaps he was not an orator in the ordinary sense of the term. He never seemed to aim at rhetorical effect. Sincerity and earnestness characterized his words, and his delivery was at times impassioned and always clear, logical and effective. He was the impersonation of tremendous will power. Sustained by an indomitable will, patiently, persistently, and perseveringly in the face of disappointment and failure, he bore his way through great difficulties and accomplished great results.

In times of uncertainty and doubt men were prone to gather around his strong will and draw inspiration and confidence from its unflinching self-reliance. Words coming up out of the heart and sent forth with a commanding purpose never failed to make a deep impression. With an unfaltering purpose he applied himself to every task, and only death itself could subdue his overmastering will. He was great in what may be termed "representative capacity." He became one of the exponents of the hopes, aspirations, and triumphant sentiments of the American people. It is a well-recognized truth that he who leads must follow. Mr. HANNA identified himself with certain ideas and convictions that were dominant in the minds of the people, and to them gave his life, his strength, his all.

He was also great in character. In every relation of life he exhibited the traits of honesty, inflexible integrity, and a sacred regard for the rights of others. He was true to himself, true to his friends, true to country, and true to Christian civilization. His convictions were of the conscience enlightened by the judgment and reason, and were never surrendered for the sake of expediency. He was a conspicuous example of that type of our great men who have been distinguished for the persistency with which they have adhered to their convictions of justice, honor, and right. The grandest treasures of a republic are its manly men, and in the death of Mr. HANNA the country has suffered an irreparable loss.

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Naturalists tell us that birds of paradise fly swiftest against the wind and gather strength from the opposing gale. When Mr. HANNA entered public life no man was more misunderstood, more underestimated, and more misrepresented, but the storm of abuse and vituperation only served to stimulate the growth and development of his intellectual and moral qualities. While his public career was comparatively brief, the power of originality and constructive statesmanship, a progressive spirit, candor, and sincerity, tireless energy, a dauntless will, and noble deeds for country and humanity, gave him a place among the foremost citizens of the Republic. Because of what he was, because of what he represented, and because of what he did, the memory of this clean-handed, clear-minded, strong-hearted man will be forever enshrined in the hearts of his countrymen.

His mortal remains rest in the bosom of the State he served so faithfully and loved so well, but his thoughts, words, and deeds, spirit and example, will be reproduced in other sympathetic souls, let us hope, until the stars shall cease to twinkle and steal away into eternal darkness and the earth itself and man shall be no more. Mr. HANNA is not dead. Such men never die. He stepped into the skies at the close of a life crowned with honor and usefulness.

To live with fame
The gods allow to many, but to die
With equal luster, is a blessing Heaven
Selects from all her choicest boons of Fate,
And with a sparing hand on few bestows.

Mr. HILDEBRANT. Mr. Speaker—

As in many groups they were busied in diverse occupations, some in games and others in work, the Master opened the door and with a smile beckoned to the leader of the busiest group, who, laying down his tools, went within and the door shut behind him. His comrades waited for him, and, finding that he came not, realized that that was death.

It is said that centuries ago a pagan philosopher used this illustration of what we call death, and—

We have seen it occur in our midst that the Master came into the busiest group and beckoned the master of the group into the open door. He followed and the door shut. "God's finger touched him, and he slept."

The life of MARCUS ALONZO HANNA was a busy life. It teemed with happenings, both small and great. It was not, however, a career fashioned and formed by the "changes and chances of this mortal life," but it was a career that from beginning to end shaped and directed not only the affairs of men, but itself as well; that met and overcame obstacles; that bravely encountered and mastered problems; that mapped out its own course, and largely influenced the course of others. Every minute of his life was occupied with thoughts and actions which had for their purpose the betterment of the condition of his fellow-men and of his country, and his own success was incidental to his unselfish efforts in behalf of others. He was a leader of men, and he came into this leadership solely by virtue of his demonstrated ability to lead.

He became a great man. It has been said that "some men are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them." That the greatness of Senator HANNA was achieved there is no room for doubt. It was recognized, I believe, by even those who were wont to vilify and caricature him, that he carved out his own career. He died in the midst of his labors, and still his work may be said to have been finished, for so thorough were his methods and so prompt his actions that he left little undone.

To my mind MARCUS A. HANNA was the ideal American citizen. It was through a sense of duty that he entered actively into the political field. He might have ended his life's labors in the seclusion and peace of his home as a retired business man and have held aloof from politics as from something contaminating, as, alas, do many of our successful business men, but he felt his place to be in the din and noise of life's battle, where he could use his great abilities in the right settlement of political questions, as he had used them in the business and social and ethical fields of his endeavors. His rise in the political arena was substantial, though rapid, for it was the result of the application of the methods that brought him his other successes, methods that win success everywhere and under all conditions—straightforwardness, honesty, frankness, truth, and sincerity.

These virtues were the warp and woof of MARK HANNA'S character, and linked as they were to an indomitable will and a high purpose, they made for the best that human nature can accomplish.

Senator HANNA had no specialty. He did all things well. And it was the aggregate of his achievements that made him great, rather than any one thing he did. He did things simply and without ostentation. He exercised his abilities quietly and unassumingly, yet he left the impress of his strong personality upon every thing or subject with which he came in contact.

He had a bright, genial, sunny disposition, which completely hid whatever disappointments came into his life. His friends loved him and his enemies had learned to respect him. He in turn loved his friends and despised not his enemies. This mutual love was not platonic or feigned, nor was it sycophancy on the one side for favors granted or expected or, on the other side, a false profession of friendship, but it was real and true affection, as was evidenced by the sincere grief of Senator HANNA'S hosts of friends when his earthly life ended. The entire country, not much less than the State of Ohio, mourns his taking away, and our feelings are akin to those we experienced when our loved McKinley was so ruthlessly snatched from us.

But, Mr. Speaker, it can not be that the busy and fruitful life of MARCUS A. HANNA is as a story that is told. I believe that, although his earthly activities have ceased, he will live on in the minds and hearts of men until the end of time as an exemplar of civic and political virtue and of personal rectitude of character; and I think that more than to any others should he be to the young men of America an example of right living, as a business man and as a politician, as a statesman and as a friend, as a husband and as a father, for—

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, in the Theta Delta Chi fraternity, to which I belong, when we assemble to bury a brother each one of us deposits a flower upon his grave; and so here to-day where we have assembled to complete the funeral ceremonies in honor of a man who in a larger sense was our brother, I come to put a flower of affection in that bouquet of love and respect we this day, in the name of the American people, deposit in the most sacred archives of this Capitol as a token of devotion to the memory of MARCUS ALONZO HANNA.

I do not speak of Senator HANNA as an intimate personal friend. My relations to him were mainly political. Owing to some mutual misunderstandings, our first acquaintance was hostile, but as soon as he understood the facts about which we differed he not only accorded to me all that I had contended for, but conceded more than I had the right to expect, and became my friend, and continued my friend down to his death.

SENATOR HANNA'S MAGNANIMITY.

Such was the magnanimity he displayed toward me that I at once felt that he was a truly great man and a truly good man, for he had almost unlimited power in the matters about which we differed, and a small-minded man or a bad-hearted man would have used his power to have crushed me, whereas Senator HANNA not only righted the wrong he had done me, but gave me more than I contended for. The result was I soon learned to respect and honor him, and my regard grew as my knowledge of him increased, until at the time of his death I had a respect and reverence for him greater than for any living man.

When my troubles with Senator HANNA over some appointments in my district began I carried my case to President McKinley. The President, after hearing me, said: "I am satisfied. You go to Senator HANNA and tell him what you have told me, and he will do you right. You can trust him; he is a just man." I protested that Senator HANNA had been saturated with misinformation and was much prejudiced against me. The President replied: "I know him better than you do. He will do you justice." So I went again to Senator HANNA and found him the just man President McKinley had represented him.

I mention these personal matters to illustrate the character of Senator HANNA. I am satisfied that the great power he wielded during the opening of McKinley's first Administration did not inflame his heart with pride or develop the slightest traits of tyranny.

> Oh, it is excellent
> To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
> To use it like a giant.

I wondered at first why Senator HANNA had been so magnanimous. I confess I had not been accustomed to the chivalric magnanimity he accorded me. In my political warfare thitherto the only alternative was to cut down my adversary or be cut down by him in a conflict that knew neither truce nor surrender, and when Senator HANNA conceded to me what I was claiming, when I was absolutely in his power, I could hardly realize the fact.

But as time rolled on, and I learned more of him from many sources, I realized that my contention had been with a great and good man, who scorned to belittle himself by taking advantage of his power, but rather took pleasure in righting the wrong he had done.

Great, therefore, was the personal blow I felt when the news came that Senator HANNA was dead, and the blow I felt tens of thousands of others felt, and a pall of gloom overspread the whole land. One of the great lights in our country's firmament had ceased to shine, and in sorrow we all realized that the eclipse was forever, except in so far as its light was reflected on the pages of our country's history and in the hearts of his fellow-citizens and in the admiration of all mankind.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF M'KINLEY FOR HANNA.

President McKinley and Senator HANNA were so closely allied that, knowing McKinley's affection for HANNA and his supreme confidence in his judgment and goodness, and knowing, too, HANNA'S affection for his great chief, and his absolute loyalty, when McKinley was so suddenly and so tragically cut off in the very noonday of his greatness and glory, it seemed to me that his personal mantle had fallen on the Titanic shoulders of Senator HANNA, and so my regard and reverence for him, already great, was much increased.

I easily recall that pathetic moment when, stretched on the painful bed of death at Buffalo, the dying McKinley, unable to see who was present in the room, called out, "Is MARK here?" and how, when Senator HANNA spoke to him and laid his hand upon his head, the President seemed to feel relieved, and a smile of complacent satisfaction lit up his face and illumined the room.

And, as after Mr. McKinley's death the nation loved and honored him the more, so also the nation began to honor and love HANNA more. The sanctity that enveloped McKinley in the public estimation, transfiguring him into a saintly hero after his martyrdom, shed its holiness and its glory upon McKinley's greatest friend and closest political brother until HANNA himself became the living representative and successor of the dead McKinley and the perpetuator of his dynasty.

And when he died it seemed not only that the great Ohio Senator had forever departed from our midst, but that the lingering spirit of McKinley had departed with him, and that a great era in our country's history, an era crowded with many and mighty events, changing our history and the history and map of the world, an era more brilliant, more glorious, more magnificent, and more fruitful of mighty and beneficent consequences than any in our history since the days of Washington—it seemed to us all that with the death of McKinley and HANNA this stupendous and illustrious era had forever closed and the volume of the record thereof had been completed for all time.

HANNA, HOBART, AND M'KINLEY, THE GREAT TRIUMVIRATE.

How mighty, how magnificent, how thrilling, and yet how tragic, the pageant beheld by the American people since that day, only seven years ago, when McKinley, Hobart, and HANNA first stood up in this Capitol to be crowned with the greatest political honors the greatest Republic of the world ever bestows. McKinley, Hobart, and HANNA, a mighty triumvirate of patriots, only seven short years ago here in our midst, encircled by the great men of our nation, full of life and joy and hope, the crowned conquerors in a tremendous political contest, the recipients of the plaudits of many millions of enthusiastic friends, happy in the wide prospect of almost unlimited power, inspired with great plans for the welfare of their party, the good of their country, and the happiness of mankind, the circumambient air balmy with the breath of millions of spring's fairest flowers, and the heavens reverberating with the applause of countless multitudes of men, the music of many martial bands, and the thunder of cannons shouting their approbation.

What a sublime event! Grand and spectacular enough to have drawn to it the spirits of our patriot dead. And now where are these three choice statesmen of our country and our generation? Where are McKinley, Hobart, and HANNA? Gone, gone—forever gone; gone like the sublime pageant that ushered in their inauguration—

> And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
> The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
> The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
> Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
> And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
> Leave not a rack behind.

But time continues, the seasons come and go, seed time and harvest follow each other in orderly succession, the Republic of our love survives, the same God who has cared for us since the days of Washington still keeps watch and ward over us, other great men are raised up to take their stand in the field of action and to occupy their seats in the halls of council; and the eagle of Columbia soars and circles triumphantly above the Dome of the nation's Capitol, with unruffled feathers and steady wing, in an unclouded sky, bathed in the golden light of that sun he loves so well, his eye sweeping to every confine of the Republic, and his cry of supremacy challenged by no nation in all the world.

HANNA A NAPOLEON IN POLITICAL WARFARE.

Senator HANNA was a politician, but a politician in the largest sense. He brought to politics the practical methods of business. He organized his party as it was never organized before, and it was this organization that brought victory to his side. And when we consider that this organization covered a continent and embraced 44 States and 70,000,000 people, we have some slight conception of the magnitude of the undertaking.

So marvelously fitted was he by nature and by training and by inclination to head the great army of protection and sound money in the tremendous conflict with the legions of free silver and free trade that he seemed created and commissioned and inspired for the leadership. Truly—

We are but as the instruments of Heaven;
Our work is not design, but destiny.

The battle waged by the contending hosts in 1896 was the most stupendous ever fought in the political world. Senator HANNA's opponents numbered over 6,000,000 voting men, all active, patriotic, and enthusiastic Americans, drilled by captains skilled in political warfare, marshaled for the conflict by veteran leaders, and captained by a political Henry of Navarre whose energy was sublime, whose confidence seemed inspired by a destiny, whose splendid personality fired his followers with an enthusiasm akin to frenzy, and whose talents and genius magnetized all who met or heard him.

For four months the battle raged. Forty-four States, some of them equal to nations in territory and population, were the battle fields, and a whole continent the general theater of operations. From Lakes to Gulf, from river to mountain, from land to sea, and from ocean to ocean the roar of the mighty conflict resounded.

The forces of Bryan raged and flamed far and wide like a prairie fire, and nothing seemed able to stay the irresistible conflagration; the forces of HANNA moved forward like tremendous ocean waves, sweeping all before them and beating down all opposition. The advocates of free silver came rushing on like the tempestuous tornado of torrid climes, crushing everything in its fury; the defenders of the gold standard withstood the shock as the mountain withstands the tempest. The champions of free trade, like the guards of Napoleon at Waterloo, charged at the close of the battle with an enthusiasm and valor that no human army seemed able to resist; but the phalanxes of protection, like the invincible troops of Wellington, held their ground with an endurance and a courage seldom equaled and never surpassed in political warfare.

THE ANIMOSITY IN THE CAMPAIGN.

As in ancient warfare the main struggle was to slay the chieftain in command, so in this battle every effort was made to destroy this champion of protection and sound money. Ten thousand venomous slanders were hurled at him; cartoons without number were fired at him; the heaviest political artillery, loaded to the muzzle with the most destructive ammunition, poured upon him a ceaseless cannonade, and millions of political squibs, torpedoes, popguns, and firecrackers made a deafening uproar whenever his name was mentioned or wherever he appeared on the field of action.

In that tremendous conflict wherever he was there the fight was hottest and the thunder of combat the loudest. Leonidas at the pass of Thermopylæ, fighting almost single handed against the countless hosts of Persia, was not more fiercely assailed than was HANNA in the tremendous battle of 1896.

But amid the sulphurous storms of calumny, the fierce lightnings of vituperation, and the fearful thunders of denunciation; amid the incessant and fiery assaults of editors and cartoonists; amid the hissing shafts of invective and the ponderous maledictions of mighty orators, hurled amid immense crowds with mighty shouts of approval, and reenforced by the most malignant resolutions, vociferously and unanimously adopted, MARK HANNA stood—and in no degree disconcerted or dismayed, serenely giving his orders to his lieutenants, or issuing encouraging bulletins of the progress of the battle in distant parts of the field.

As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

Some one has said that free thought is commonly understood to be the right to freely express our contempt for the thoughts of others, and Goethe has said that all the Germans gained by the freedom of their press was the liberty of abusing each other as much as they liked. And so in our country, those men are loudest mouthed in claiming the right of free speech who are foulest mouthed in misusing that right.

In politics misrepresentation, vilification, abuse, and travesty, cartoons, caricatures, and scurrility are so common that many have come to regard them as legitimate, and some consider them essential, while not a few look on a political campaign without these accessories as dull, flat, stale, and unprofitable.

Having been given the leadership of his party in two great Presidential campaigns, Senator HANNA made no complaint when assailed by every form of speech, song, picture, and print that political ingenuity could devise or partisan prejudice concoct.

When reviled, he reviled not again. He heeded not the assaults of his antagonists. He was blind to the cartoon and deaf to the defamation, devoting all his thoughts and all his energies to the education of the people in the issues of the campaign, carefully pointing out and mile-marking the road to prosperity and the pathways of peace and plenty.

HANNA'S GRAND TRIUMPH OVER CALUMNY.

But when the battle had been fought and won; when people of all parties, on a nearer and fuller view, had better opportunities to study and understand this great party leader, this omnipotent campaign manager; when his private record had been all searched, and found so bright and so blameless; when it was found that the mud of slander thrown at him did not stick, that the arrows of malice did not wound, that the charges fired at him had but ended in noise, and that, like a mighty war ship coming out of the storm and the battle and the breakers unharmed into the port of safety, with flags of triumph flying and the bands of music playing the tunes of victory and of joy; when it was seen that HANNA, like good gold, was only the brighter for the rubbing he had received; when his manifold acts of charity and benevolence became better known; when his earnest and persistent efforts to aid the laboring men of the nation to secure a larger share in the fruits of their industry began to be considered, and when, last of all, his beautiful devotion to William McKinley won for him a better hearing and a more considerate judgment, then the storms of prejudice that had thundered about him began to disappear, then the arrow of malice was put back into its quiver, then the missile was dropped by the hand that held it, then the cartoonist threw away his pencil, and the mouth of the accuser was closed, and lo! the world beheld in MARCUS ALONZO HANNA one of the world's best and greatest men and one of nature's grandest noblemen.

General Grant, dying on Mount McGregor, no longer the target of political opponents, no longer breathing an atmosphere foul with slander, no longer belittled by hired cartoonists, no longer exposed to the poison-tipped shafts of irony and invective, but dying in perfect peace, in an atmosphere sweet with the fragrance of flowers and the breath of a holy and universal sympathy, beloved by the hundreds of thousands who had fought under him, honored and respected by the hundreds of thousands who had fought against him, reverenced by all men, of all parties, and of all sections—Grant, dying on Mount McGregor, had not more completely lived down all personal and political hostility than had MARCUS A. HANNA, dying at the Arlington, amid the lamentations of the mighty nation he loved so well and had striven so hard to serve.

Senator HANNA was clean in his politics. It is said by his successor, Senator DICK, that none of the money spent by him in the great McKinley campaign was used for corruption. He kept no slop trough to which the swine of politics might resort. His aim was to fill the head of the voter and not his stomach; to reach the voter's heart through his head and not through his pocket. "Millions for instruction, but not one cent for corruption," was his motto, and the campaign of education he conducted by pen, pencil, press, picture, and preacher was the most remarkable in magnitude and effectiveness this country, or any country, has ever known.

HANNA THE CHAMPION OF THE PANAMA ROUTE.

Next to his success as a captain in great political battles, Senator HANNA will be best remembered for his championship of the Panama Canal. In consequence of the French ownership of the Panama route and the contracts between the French owners and the Republic of Colombia, our country seemed shut out from the Panama route, and we were consequently forced to look up another route for our canal.

Then it was that we turned to the Nicaragua route, and we had almost determined to construct our canal on that route when Senator HANNA, with surprising resolution and powerful argumentation, and almost unaided and alone, stood forth as the champion of Panama; and such was the force of his arguments and so convincing the facts he arrayed in behalf of his contention that he succeeded in having Panama brought into consideration; and he finally won a triumphant success in having the Panama route selected and acquired.

Never in our history has one man ever won a more signal victory. Solitary and alone he began the battle, and when the friends of the Nicaragua route came rushing on with triumphant shouts and in apparently irresistible numbers, HANNA, undaunted, stood in their way, and by his courage and persistence, by his logic and zeal, and especially by the great influence he wielded with the head men of the nation, he stayed the almost unanimous sentiment in favor of the Nicaragua route and succeeded in having Panama chosen in its stead.

More than three hundred years ago that great navigator, Sir Walter Raleigh, told Queen Elizabeth that the nation owning Panama held "the keys of the world," and Senator HANNA, by having the Panama route selected, secured for our country "the keys of the world."

And when the Panama Canal shall have been completed, and the marriage of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans finally consummated, after being separated since the foundation of the world, when the ships of all nations pass through I hope their sailors may behold upon the heights of Culebra, halfway between the seas, the statue of MARCUS A. HANNA, rising like a Titan, both arms outstretched, one pointing toward the Atlantic and the other toward the Pacific, and inscribed on the statue's pedestal in electric letters these words:

Behold the two oceans which this canal, like a marriage bond, has united and made as one.

Senator HANNA was a lover of his country, and gave evidence of this by joining the Federal Army in the great struggle for the preservation of the Union, and was one of the men assigned to the defense of this city and participated in the battle at Fort Stevens in July, 1864.

HANNA A LOVER OF HIS FELLOW-MAN.

A man who loves his country necessarily loves his countrymen, and Senator HANNA gave many evidences of his good will for his fellow-man and was constantly engaged in works of benevolence and deeds of charity.

While worth millions of money, while a Senator of the United States from one of our greatest States, while forced by his position and associations into the constant company of the rich, the great, and the famous, Senator HANNA never forgot that there were poor men and poor women and poor children in the world, never ceased to remember the humble toilers in the mine, the mill, the factory, and the field, and his great heart and great mind were deeply interested in plans to better their condition and make happier their lives. And he often said he would rather harmonize labor and capital, rather devise a plan whereunder the employer and the employee might cooperate with mutual good will and mutual advantage, than be President of the United States; and the last years of his life were devoted to the solution of this stupendous problem.

He was one of the founders and the chairman of the National Civic Federation, a society formed for the purpose of reconciling differences between large corporations and their employees, using the Golden Rule as their motto and law of action; and great was the good he had done and was doing at his death, through this federation, as well as by his individual efforts. Well might he have said with the Roman poet—

Homo sum; humani nihil a me alienum puto.

I am a human being, and nothing that concerns a human being is a matter of unconcern to me.

The labor organizations of the United States had learned to trust him, the labor leaders were in constant consultation with him, and the philanthropists of the world had begun to concentrate their attention upon him as the man most likely to solve the problem of labor versus capital to the advantage and satisfaction of both. And when Senator HANNA died there were no more sincere mourners at his grave than the laboring men of our country; and truly might there be inscribed on his tombstone:

Loved by the poor and honored by the great.

The great plans he had formed for the revival of the American merchant marine, for the reconciliation of labor and capital, for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, and for the perpetuation of American prosperity he did not live to carry out; and when he died all of these great questions lost a powerful champion and a zealous and effective friend. To all of those interested in the happy solution of these problems he was a veritable tower of strength, a—

Tower of strength,
Which stood four-square to all the winds that blew.

We failed fully to realize how great and good a man he was until he died, and then we were appalled by the magnitude of the vacancy made by his death. Verily, he was a colossus in politics and in statesmanship, and for generations his mighty proportions will be the standard by which political greatness will be measured; and also for generations will he be pointed to as an example of how a man can be great in politics and in statesmanship and great in business enterprises and commercial ventures and great as the friend of the poor, the helper of the humble, and the benefactor of charity—all at the same time.

But the curtain has fallen upon the scenes of his activities. The pall of death hides him from our view. He has become a citizen of another world, and all that is left for us is to remember his splendid deeds, to love him for his goodness, to honor him for his greatness, and to emulate the magnificent example he has left us. The prosperity of our country is his monument and the words of a nation's gratitude is his epitaph.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the characteristics and trend of mind of the late MARCUS A. HANNA were a revelation and a subject of wide comment to men of all classes in the State which I have the honor in an humble capacity to represent, and having been in touch with both of the interests which his thoughts, advice, and actions most vitally concerned, I shall venture to say a few words in his memory.

Perhaps no other State in the Union is so prone as Pennsylvania to what is called "strikes;" no State in which labor organizes and fights through strikes for what it considers its rights; no State in which, on the other hand, capital as determinedly opposes what it considers unjust demands on the part of labor.

It might, therefore, have been supposed that with these problems always before them there would have arisen among the men of Pennsylvania one who would perhaps have offered some practical suggestions toward their solution, but it was left to the State of Ohio to produce such a man in the late MARCUS A. HANNA. He more nearly than any man up to his time had approached the solution of this, the greatest problem which an industrial nation like the United States has to face, and I believe that had he lived he would have suggested a method which would have satisfied both sides.

Therefore Pennsylvania and Pennsylvanians owe much to Mr. HANNA in bringing them to realize the possibilities of a solution of the greatest problem which faces the economic conditions of their State.

Senator HANNA'S greatness lay in his simplicity of character and the truthfulness of his soul. He treated great subjects with the same directness of thought that he did small, and believed that they were as easy of solution as small ones, were the same principles of honesty and conviction applied.

Senator HANNA'S great purposes and broad policies are borne tribute to by the measures he advocated and brought to success; his great qualities of mind by the high regard in which he was held by the great men of the hour; his nobleness of heart and affectionate nature by the thousands of rich and poor, high and low, who either came to his bier to pay visible tribute or mourned in their hearts at home.

It is the kindly acts which a man performs to those who are struggling on a lower plane which I think really proves true kindness of heart, for it is always comparatively easy for a great man to do a favor for another great man.

In this instance let me relate an anecdote. We all realize that the position of a new Congressman is not, as a rule, one to be envied. He comes here to Congress having promised greater or less things to his constituents, and he finds—what each one of us found—that he does not amount to much, except to make up a quorum or to swell the vote by answering to roll call. I don't think a new Congressman ever forgets those who were kind to him or gave him a helping hand during his days of initiation.

Now, there was a certain new Congressman, not from Ohio, who had to go over to the Senate on a certain occasion to try to induce his Senator to give his support to a measure in which some of his constituents were interested. He was not at all sure as to whether or not the Senator would give the support he desired, and his anxiety was increased by his unsuccessful effort to find the Senator. As he was hurrying through the Marble Room, looking on this side and on that, he suddenly heard a genial voice call out "Won't I do as well as the fellow you are looking for?" and turning around he saw Senator HANNA seated on a sofa beside a friend, but with a hand held out to him. His fears vanished and his confidence in his purpose returned.

No better example could be found of Senator HANNA'S character—always ready and even looking for opportunities to do a kind act.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, men may come and men may go, and yet this busy world of ours still goes on; but we can one and all, concerning MARCUS A. HANNA, join in exclaiming: "Oh, for the touch of the vanished hand (of friendship), and the sound of the voice (of encouragement) that is still!"

There is a set phrase to the effect that "some achieve greatness, others have greatness thrust upon them;" but, after all, the only greatness, to my mind, worth having is that greatness which comes as a tribute to love and sympathy shown by a man to his fellowmen.

We are told that "as we brought nothing into this world, so we can take nothing out." That may be true as far as material things are concerned, but can we really say that Senator HANNA took nothing with him, when the word of his death took joy from the hearts of thousands and left a nation in mourning?

And if it be so that "as ye have lived so shall ye be judged," how great are the rewards we may confidently believe were awaiting him in the land beyond the skies.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I count it a privilege to say a word in memory of my friend Senator HANNA. Living in the same faith and hope, with the same purposes in life and the same regard for the great citizenship in which we live, and the same belief in the Divine purposes of this great nation, I bring my tribute to his life and services.

His character was not made in a day. One of his ancestral race said, "There's many a hard stroke goes to the making of a man." If I could tell my boys the story of his life, it would be the story of an American boy who went barefoot to an American district school, and then to the academy, and then to work, and then to business. And he played the same games and recited the same lessons, and learned labor and toil in the same way that American boys who become men have played and learned.

Trained in the stern old faith that God is the eternal God to whom we must answer for duty performed or duty neglected, he fought over and over again the battles of the soul that every true man must fight and must finally win. Truth and honor and fidelity became the constant attitude of his mind and soul by the constant exercise of these great things. No man who had not acquired strength and endurance of soul by these battles with himself could have stood the conflict of life that came to him in the years of his public career as he stood them and won the victory he won.

But his great victory over adverse public opinion was not his greatest victory. His later years were so associated with his friend President McKinley that the men can hardly be separated in our minds. When we think of one we habitually think of the other. Both of them lived and labored to carry forward the divine purpose of humanity. Both came from the common American homes, from the common American schools, from the common American business life. Both had the same standards of home life and duty, and the same standards of public life and duty.

McKinley was a widow's son, a schoolboy, a student, a citizen volunteer soldier, a lawyer, a Member of Congress, a governor of his State, and then President of a great nation of free people. When he died and was carried to his grave the whole busy world stopped its busy work while his body was lowered to its grave. "The Czar in his palace, the Kaiser in Berlin, King Edward in Denmark, the Duke of York in Montreal, all members of the governments in their offices, the workingmen in their factories, the people in the streets, trains and cars on their tracks, steamships at sea and boats on the rivers, all public buildings, stores, and places of amusement, the entire machinery of mankind, came to a stop and stood still in silence while he was laid to rest." He had conquered the world by his character.

When Senator HANNA lay dying, at every place in the world men inquired from hour to hour, and the hearts of mankind bowed when the final message came. His body was carried into the Capitol of the nation and into the Chamber of the greatest legislative body in civilization. The Senators and Representatives of our National Congress stood around his bier. The Supreme Court of the United States, the greatest court in the world, came and stood uncovered beside him. The President and his Cabinet and the commanders of our Army and Navy stood beside him. The diplomatic corps, representing fifty-three nations of the earth, stood beside him. The eloquent Edward Everett Hale said the words of farewell and consolation and hope, and laid his character, like a benediction, upon us.

Both these burials were the testimony of mankind to the character of the men whom Liberty's nation has given to the world. Christian mothers trained them both. How gentle their lives are making us. What kindly, earnest, strong standards of life they have given us, and how imperceptibly and unconsciously we are following their standards. The glories of our victories in the late war with Spain are almost forgotten in our memories of these men. The influence of their lives spreads over us all and inspires us with the faith that "love, honor, courage, fidelity, and a noble self-sacrifice are better than life." This is their victory over us. They have won our hearts, and their memories live to instruct our boys. And beyond the veil, they are with the Redeemer, in whose faith they lived and labored and loved. "It is God's way; His will be done."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, in the very few moments I shall occupy I shall not attempt to discuss the great characteristics of Senator HANNA. I will only refer very briefly to some of the salient points of his career and contribute to the record more elaborate suggestions in the same direction.

I did not know Senator HANNA well until he became connected with the activities of Ohio politics. He had been a member of our State executive committee, or an advisory member, for a considerable number of years before the public outside of the State came to know him. I indorse all that has been said in regard to the unselfish character of Senator HANNA. He never entered politics for any selfish purpose. He never remained in politics for a like consideration, and he never sought personal preferment until the time came when that alone could become a vindication due to his own party and the dearest friend that he had within the lines of that party. He believed thoroughly in the principles of the party to which he belonged. No man ever more faithfully stood by the tenets of his party, and no man ever was clearer of any purpose of halting or compromising or apologizing for anything that he believed to be a true doctrine of political rights.

Senator HANNA was a reader and student of politics. He did not, as many have supposed, grasp every idea without studious consideration and careful weighing of arguments pro and con. He was a student of theories illustrated by practical facts. To the theories of the writer and the speaker he applied practical everyday common sense, of which he was a storehouse. It was these qualities that made him so powerful as a business man. Theories were to him only suggestions; practical facts were to him the demonstration of the falsity or the truth of theories.

Senator HANNA was a warm supporter of John Sherman for President of the United States; and, though I have not seen it adverted to since his death, it was a fact within my own observation and the knowledge of many others who are here, that he opposed the attitude of Mr. McKinley in one of those grand State campaigns, and having cast in his lot with Sherman, notwithstanding all his affection for McKinley, he did all in his power to prevent the breaking up and disintegration of the Ohio delegation, even though McKinley, acting under the instruction of his friends at home, cast his vote in the convention for James G. Blaine.

Senator HANNA about that time or shortly afterwards became warmly attached to McKinley; and that attachment grew to be one of the most beautiful exhibitions of love between the two men that I have ever witnessed. He believed in McKinley. He had seen the rise and progress and growth and development of that splendid character. He had lived in the immediate section of the State where McKinley resided and had known him as a young lawyer. I remember an anecdote that he told me in the presence of one who knew the facts, how McKinley came down to some of his coal mines, where some riotous coal miners had been prosecuted for riots, and McKinley defended the miners and assailed the management of the mines. Senator HANNA said that was the first time that he ever felt the full appreciation of the possibilities of McKinley.

From time to time, as the campaign of 1896 developed, it was currently reported that HANNA would be benefited in some way by the election of McKinley. I want to contribute this much to the history of those times, with which I was thoroughly familiar: I personally know, and there are others who know the same thing and from the same source of knowledge, that immediately following the election of 1896 President McKinley tendered to Mr. HANNA formally a position in his Cabinet; and I remember distinctly the answer that HANNA made, although I did not see the letters that passed between them.

He said that it would appear to the people of the country that he had been selfish and self-seeking in the matter of his strong support for McKinley; and he preferred the character and reputation of a disinterested friend of Mr. McKinley's to any office that McKinley could give him. And it was not until McKinley had tendered, in writing, the place of Secretary of State to Mr. Sherman and it had been accepted by him that HANNA yielded to the suggestion that he should be a candidate for the United States Senatorship; and then he did so at the urgent personal request of McKinley, who said that if he could not have him in the Cabinet he desired that he should be a member of the Senate. Thus it was that it came to our knowledge that he was not a self-seeking politician, but was a disinterested friend, first of McKinley and next of the success of the great party to which he belonged.

It was a chapter in Ohio politics that I do not intend to enter upon, to which reference has been made by some of the gentlemen who have preceded me. I do not want to recall, except for the sake of the justice of history, the events of the year when HANNA, having been tendered and having accepted the position of Senator, having been nominated by the overwhelming vote of the State convention, was almost defeated for election. I refer to it now to say that, notwithstanding all the bitter denunciation of HANNA and his friends incidental to that great contest and that chapter in Ohio politics that brings the blush of shame to every man who was connected with the treachery of that hour and day, after all the calcium light of these months and years has been turned upon him, there was no stain of corruption or dishonor placed upon the skirts of HANNA.

I know it has been said that office was conferred for favors among the members of the State legislature. That is true; that is a part of our politics; that is incident to the politics of our country. And there was no man who more firmly believed and more religiously practiced the tenet of remembering his friends and standing by them than did HANNA. And a man who does not do that is not fit to be in politics. The man who will falter when his friend's hour of trouble comes ought to have no friends when his trial is on. That is the religion of American politics, and he who does not obey it is not fit to be a member of the great body to which an American citizen belongs.

I never heard Senator HANNA complain of a man who tried to betray him in that contest; and you have heard how he stood up and pronounced an almost tearful eulogy over the man who of all other men owed him allegiance and betrayed his duty.

When HANNA had served in the Senate and sought the approbation of his fellow-citizens in Ohio by reelection, then he became an earnest seeker for the office, not because he desired that office for selfish purposes, but because he was determined that his friends should not suffer by reason of his having been a candidate.

I do not care to refer, in the brief moment that I am to use, to that which has so often been referred to by others—the abuse and traducing of HANNA in the newspapers and throughout the country. It is a very curious study; there is no other picture like it in the history of mankind, except our account, our knowledge, our belief in the character of Him who spoke of Himself as being "despised and rejected of men" and who has since become the great and adorable central figure of Christianity.

But, without any purpose of comparison, when, in all the history of mankind, was it that a man so thoroughly hated, thoroughly despised, thoroughly condemned by ninety-nine per cent of all the people of the United States—not all of them hating, but every one of them suspicious—died in a very few short years at his post of duty covered with honor and acquit of dishonorable characteristics by an equal per cent of all mankind? How he did it I do not know.

That Senator HANNA felt keenly the abuse of himself we all know who knew him. That he suffered intensely nobody who knew him can doubt. A Senator has said since the death of Senator HANNA that on one occasion HANNA exhibited to him one of those infamous cartoons, born of the malice of a corrupt man, and shed tears over it. And there are a number of us who can state how repeatedly he said: "If I believed there was any possible justice, any possible reason, for all this, I would not shrink from bearing it; the grief that comes to me," said he, "is not on my own account, but because of the regret and sorrow that is felt by my friends."

It will not do at the end of a career like that to say that "no honest man need be afraid of slander." One honest man has lived it down; many have, but here is a conspicuous example of one who lived down the basest organization of slander ever hurled at a man in American politics and emerged from it with honor and credit.

But that does not answer the just criticism of mankind. Here was a man of distinguished life, pure in his social, political, and business relations, sound as a dollar upon every question of manhood; and yet for the purpose of destroying McKinley, whom they knew slander could not affect, because he was too well known, a vicious conspiracy of crime and slander and libel and detraction was organized and hurled at MARCUS A. HANNA. If they could destroy HANNA, the most important spoke in the wheel would be broken; and utterly regardless of every principle of humanity, every suggestion of decency, every inspiration of honor and integrity, they drove straight at the mark of ruining MARCUS A. HANNA. They did not cease with 1896. They proceeded to permeate the whole country, and little children looked with horror upon the libelous publications that were made. Such a crime as that can not be atoned for by a cowardly retraction when the victim is dead. But it is said he lived it down; he became great; he became honored; therefore there has been no harm done. Here is one victim who lived it down; here is one victim who, after years of faithful struggle, got the better of his libelers.

How many have fallen under the stroke of slander! How many have been driven away from the effort to live down libels and slanders! That is the place to look; not at that one man who has outlived and grown above the shaft of envy and ill will and crime. The question is, how many have failed to do it? How many hearts have been wronged, how many tears have been shed, how many honest men have suffered, how many wives have shed tears, how many children have fled in mortification from their fellows? That is the way to estimate the work of the libeler—the criminal libeler—the man who stalks in the community with the poison that he exudes and tarnishes the very name of Christian civilization. To what extent has his work been done? Never, until the great God above issues the decree that shall fix his punishment, will the exact value of his career be known.

Mr. Speaker, I can not pursue the subject further. I loved MARCUS A. HANNA. I never knew a man whom I admired more greatly than I did him. I never knew a man who rose so rapidly. And yet there were reasons for it and characteristics that make it not strange that he rose. But it is a wonderful history that in six years' time a man can come from obscurity, so far as public office is concerned, and enter the Senate of the United States and make the profound impression upon that great body and upon the country that he did.

I have no time for detail, but we all remember how enthusiastically we, here in this House, by an overwhelming majority, following the lead of one of our greatest men, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. HEPBURN], who so enthusiastically championed the Nicaragua Canal, we all remember with what enthusiasm we sent the bill to the Senate, and how we understood that when it reached there four-fifths of the Senate would be on our side, and yet how a single Senator, by the force of his training and his education, his character, his power of research, seized upon his knowledge of the situation and ultimately revolutionized the whole action of the Senate and received the cordial approbation of the House; and now, to-day, as we stand here eulogizing his memory, the news is just flashed into print on this side of the ocean that the great achievement has been wrought out and that the title, indefeasible and unassailed, in the Panama Canal has become ours.

Senator HANNA was most happy in his home life, and it was here at his home and at his beautiful residence on the lake shore near Cleveland that the true qualities of genuine humanity and chivalrous gentlemanly attributes shone out so brightly. His wife was a lady of most excellent fitness to be the companion and friend of HANNA. Strong in mental qualities, able and attractive in all the graces of the female character, she stood by him through his life with the devotion of a true wife; made his home at his hearthstone the citadel of love and rest; shared in his triumphs; contributed to all that made him great, and wept over him with the just consciousness that in no respect had she fallen short of her great duty as a charming and faithful wife.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have leave to print in the RECORD eulogies in commemoration of Mr. HANNA, and that the resolution in his case lie on the table until the conclusion of the other eulogies which are to be pronounced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GOEBEL). The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks unanimous consent that general leave to print eulogies upon the late Senator HANNA be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted.

DEATH OF HON. CHARLES W. THOMPSON.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. CHARLES W. THOMPSON, late a Member of this House from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of the exercises of this day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in an hour of sadness we sometimes stand aside from the maddening stream of humanity, rushing on in the daily struggle for life, and ask, What is it all about? Why this ceaseless fight for existence? Why this strenuous toil for worldly success? Why this ever unsatisfied desire to plunder more of life's honors and earth's riches than other men are allowed to do? Up from the struggling masses, straight from the fighting crowd, the answer is wafted back: "This is the day we are allowed to play our parts, the only day we will ever have; time will not stop to wait for us. On we must struggle if we expect to obtain ambition's success, for the road of life leads to waste and decay, and the end of the journey is almost in sight by the time we have well begun." Then, why should we start at all? Why labor to continue a journey that must end in darkness and in nothing? Why seek to acquire riches that leave us at the grave? Why barter the peace of life for honors that die with us and are soon buried under the mold of time? Well might we answer: 'Twere better the journey were not begun if the main highway leading on through the heat of noonday sun, through the dust of disappointed hopes, and over the jagged rocks of unsatisfied ambition were the only road over which life's burdens could be carried to the peace beyond the grave; but it is not.

Beyond the main highway there is a shady pathway whose way is blazed only to true philosophers. Along that path but few great names are inscribed; the clanking swords of the world's great generals are unheard; there none feel the iron hand of despotic rule; there the barter and soul-destroying struggle for great wealth does not thrive; there the mere brutal fight for existence is never found; there the desire to mount to success over other men's fortunes does not exist.

Only those can wander there who have learned that love of humanity, the broadening of the soul, self-respect and truth, are the true riches of life, and that peace is earth's greatest reward. Those who travel along this quiet path of life are not struggling to supplant their fellow-men; their motto is to do well their part, for there all the honor lies. This they have learned from sad experience, and that any other course leads to pain and sorrow.

In thinking of the life and death of our dead colleague and friend, CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON, I have drifted into these reflections. Our dead friend had attained many of life's victories, and yet he was not over ambitious—he did not acquire success at the cost of peace to himself. He had amassed a fair fortune, but he had not gathered it by pulling down his fellow-man. He was liberal in his charities and kindly in his heart. He had attained high political honors, but never did he belittle the success or true worth of those he competed with.

He drifted into the great beyond in his early manhood, in the midst of life's achievements and rewards, but he was a philosopher with it all, and lived and died at peace with himself and with the world. "He played well his part," and died loved and honored by his friends and constituents.

A darkening sky and a whitening sea,
And a wind in the palm trees tall,
Soon or late comes a call for me,
Down from the mountain or up from the sea;
There let me lie where I fall.

And a friend may write—for friends there be—
On a stone from the great sea wall:
Jungle and town and reef and sea—
I loved God's earth and His earth loved me,
Taken for all in all.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, twice have I been in the pleasant, hospitable, and typical town of Tuskegee, in the black belt of Alabama. On the first occasion, with a small Congressional party, I was the guest of Hon. CHARLES W. THOMPSON, of Alabama, and greatly enjoyed his whole-souled and generous hospitality. On the second occasion, as a member of the Congres ional committee, it became my privilege to accompany his body to its last resting place in the beautiful cemetery at Tuskegee, where it now lies with his kindred. My acquaintance with him and my knowledge of his many estimable personal qualities and characteristics are such as enable me to render upon this occasion, in more than a perfunctory way, a sincere and heartfelt tribute to his memory. In person he was engaging and attractive. His character was of the highest, and his personal and political integrity were above suspicion. He was a fine specimen of the Christian southern gentleman. Cut off in the forty-fourth year of his life, he was serving with great credit to himself and usefulness to his State his second term as a Member of the House.

The fact that during this relatively short life he had accumulated by honest toil and his own individual efforts what is considered a handsome fortune in his section is the conclusive demonstration of his great business ability and thrift, and furnishes the adequate reason for the prominent and leading position he occupied among the people with whom he lived, and, with his estimable personal characteristics, gives us the unerring key to the universal and widespread sorrow that was manifested at the time of his death by his fellow-citizens.

The deep, sincere, and heartfelt mourning that moved his townspeople, without regard to race or color, was a most striking tribute to his memory. The influence and position which he acquired in the House is known to us all, and is creditable to his natural abilities as well as his industrious and painstaking service in committee and on the floor.

Beyond and above this ordinary service which simply reaches the common level and is not necessarily indicative of high ideals or characterized by advancing and elevating thought, I believe that Mr. THOMPSON was sincerely and successfully contributing to the solution of one of the greatest problems that can concern the people that he represented—indissolubly united as we are, the problem that seriously concerns us all—without abandoning or surrendering any of the ideas and views which have by long contact and intimate association with the colored race become firmly imbedded in the consciousness of the Anglo-Saxon race in the South.

By precept and example, the influence of a successful business and public man, and direct personal effort, he used every endeavor to aid and facilitate the development and the elevation of this unfortunate race. Believing that the misconception and misunderstanding that exists and persists between the people of the North and the South upon this question as to the real spirit, purposes, and desires of each section was profound and unfortunate, he thought that nothing could dispel it more effectually than the actual observation by each section of conditions as they exist and by having brethren meet brethren in the home and business life of each.

It is written, "As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." There can be no question that if the people of the North could visit and meet the people of the South and the people of the South could see the people of the North by their firesides and as they pursue their various avocations to a large degree violent prejudices would fade away, false impressions would be corrected, and sectional feeling would rapidly become a thing of the past. "A consummation devoutly to the wished."

Mr. THOMPSON no doubt had these considerations in mind when he made the small Congressional party his guests, and while the visit was necessarily short and the information obtained meager, I feel justified in saying that all felt it a move in the right direction, and that those who constituted the party were beginning to more accurately appreciate real existing conditions.

He did not, however, satisfy himself by generalities, but devoted a great portion of his tireless, well-directed energy to aiding individuals of the race whose lot had been cast with his in the most practical and efficient manner. In answer to a letter from me for specific information upon this great question, he wrote on February 12, 1903, a letter which throws a flood of light upon the proper method of ultimately and successfully solving the race problem, in which he said:

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your personal request for information regarding the colored people whom you met while on your visit to Alabama with "the Thompson party" last year, I introduced to you, on my plantation, James Whitlow, colored, who can neither read nor write, and who owns 880 acres of well-improved farming land, valued at $12,000, and upon which there is no incumbrance, and also ten head of mules, cattle, etc. He is the father of ten children, all of whom can read and write. His oldest son has purchased and is operating a public steam gin, and gins cotton for his community, keeps the books, and manages the business. Whitlow is a good citizen, enjoys a good credit, and is well respected by all of his neighbors, both white and black. He pays but little attention to politics, seldom ever votes, and is an honest, upright citizen.

I also introduced to you Mose Green, who owns 400 acres of land, valued at $4,000, which he purchased from me eight years ago on time without making a cash payment and paid for in four years. He has it well improved, is out of debt, and owns six mules and horses.

He is an ex-slave, and can not read or write, but has six or eight children, all of whom can read and write; and his oldest son has recently bought and paid for 160 acres of land.

You were also introduced to Anthony Griffin, who purchased 400 acres of land adjoining that of Mose Green. He has it paid for, and has educated all of his children at Booker Washington's school. He, like the others, can neither read nor write.

Charlie Davis was also present, who owns 640 acres of land, valued at $4,000, which he purchased some years ago on time, and which is now unencumbered and paid for. He has a fairly good common school education, is a good citizen, and enjoys a good credit.

We have in my county twenty or thirty other colored citizens who own good tracts of land, well improved, and who are accumulating property every year, and who are also educating their children at Booker Washington's school and in the public schools of the county. These thrifty, economical, industrious colored people pay very little attention to politics; in fact, they seldom go to the polls; are highly respected in their sphere by both white and black, and enjoy the friendship, confidence, and protection of the white people.

A great many of the colored people you met on my plantation the day you spent there have lived as tenants on my land for the past twenty years and have lived comfortably, but have been extravagant and thriftless and have never accumulated much property.

Booker Washington's school has done a great work for the colored people in that section in stimulating and encouraging them to secure homes, accumulate property, and educate their children.

I have learned since Mr. THOMPSON's death what his modesty would not permit him to state in a personal letter, and that is that the larger portion of these "colored citizens" were indebted to him for the financial aid and business advice that enabled them to become good citizens, entitled to and receiving the respect of the people among whom they lived and wrought.

In this noble work I conceive he was discharging the highest duty of American citizenship, and for it he is entitled to the most unreserved commendation. It is a splendid object lesson of what may be accomplished by practical common-sense methods.

One of Mr. THOMPSON's most striking characteristics was his accurate knowledge of human nature and the certainty with which he could select men who were worthy of help and would not abuse his confidence. He is fully entitled to the encomium of Dean Swift, who declared that—

Whoever could make two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together.

Who can render greater service to his country than he who demonstrates the possibility of making useful citizens of a race which, under proper conditions of education and development, should prove and will prove the South's most valuable agricultural and industrial resource? Rightly and wisely utilized, it will be the most potent factor in the development of that agricultural, industrial, and material greatness which is the God-given birthright of that land of brave men and fair and virtuous women.

Where are the Anglo-Saxons who, with the same opportunity, struggling against the same disadvantages, can show the same achievement and success that have attended the efforts of James Whitlow, Mose Green, Anthony Griffin, Charles Davis, and "twenty or thirty other colored citizens," aided by such men as Mr. THOMPSON? Given enough of such colored men and enough such men to aid them, and the race question will, when time enough shall have elapsed for the proper operation of these legitimate forces, work out its own solution.

The establishment of a home to shelter his wife and children, the education of his children, teaching the gospel of honest toil, and the accumulation of property adequate for their comfortable maintenance and support are essential features in all true American citizenship. These possessed and all other essential elements follow, "as the night the day." To these noble ends Mr. THOMPSON unselfishly bent his best energies with most gratifying success. He was not only the friend and supporter of every good work, but he was especially interested in and efficiently supported the magnificent work being done by Booker T. Washington in the Tuskegee Institute.

He was a firm believer in its great utility, beginning as it does at the bottom with practical industrial education, laying the firm foundation without which no enduring superstructure can stand. That his work in this direction was thoroughly appreciated by the colored people no one could fail to see who witnessed the great outpouring of that race as they gathered at the funeral exercises and followed his body to the grave with sincere, pathetic, and unobtrusive manifestations of profound sorrow.

True it is that they have lost a firm and faithful friend, his town its foremost and well-beloved citizen, and his State and his country a broad, liberal-minded, catholic, and progressive Christian statesman. May we not express the belief that his progressive, enlightened, catholic, and patriotic spirit was in truth and fact in harmony with the prevailing sentiment of the law-abiding, patriotic, God-fearing people of his beloved Southland? That, without antagonizing or attempting to eradicate ideas that are the result of generations of development, education, and heredity in opening the door of opportunity to a race recently emerged from barbarism and kindling the flame of hope in the breast of the lowly, he correctly voiced the higher and nobler sentiment that is perhaps slowly, but none the less surely, pervading the land of the orange and the palm?

If we are justified in entertaining this belief, the time can not be far distant when, under the blessing and guidance of the God of nations, our fathers' God and our God, we shall witness the full fruition of the scriptural saying, "For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then, face to face."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I have come to-day to join in these ceremonies, to indorse the beautiful sentiments uttered in behalf of our dead friend, and to vote for the resolutions which have been offered. The melancholy occasion and knowledge derived from an intimate association with Mr. THOMPSON naturally suggest the thoughts that come to me.

While death is looked upon as the final and great calamity in every life, it at least brings all living men to the position where they are willing and disposed to do justice to the dead, whether foe or comrade. It is perhaps true that the best measure of any man can be had after his departure from the conflicts of life. His friends can then best contemplate his good deeds and his honorable career. If he had antagonists while living, he is no longer in competition with them. He has ceased to be the object of jealousy or envy. The grave has in his case silenced in the hearts of living men these human frailties.

In great sorrow we now pay loving and just tribute to the character, the public services, and the useful life of our departed friend.

On this the Lord's Day we have converted this Hall, the scene of many a fierce political struggle, into a sort of sanctuary, into a place where we acknowledge the omnipotence of God, and bow in recognition to His universal law—the law of life and death. We stand in the presence of death and confess that man, with all of his boasted knowledge and ingenuity, must in the end admit his inability to defeat the dread reaper, and that, sooner or later, under the inexorable providence of God, all the sons and daughters of Adam will go willingly or unwillingly to join the departed in the great beyond.

In considering the success that our friend achieved in life we ought to be mindful of the obstacles that he met with and that he overcame, for all success is measurable; it is all comparative. We find that less than forty-four years ago this young man was born in Macon County, Ala., at a time when the fair land of the South was suffering acutely from a cruel and devastating war. He was born amidst devastation. The section of our great country from which he came was then about to undergo an industrial revolution—a change from slave labor to free labor—under which changed conditions doubtless the South has achieved greater industrial development than would have been possible under the old conditions. In short, we may say that Mr. THOMPSON was a child of the bloodiest war of the nineteenth century.

As soon as he had reached the age and growth that enabled him to see over the top of a business counter in his father's store he engaged in helping his father earn a livelihood for a large and growing family. He was put to work—aye, he went to work in his early youth gladly and willingly. The citizens of his town are fond of relating the story of his work, beginning when he was a barefooted boy and ending when he was a planter on a large scale, a successful banker, and an honored Member of Congress. We can not doubt that the experience and practice which he had, beginning in his early youth, equipped and trained him so that he became a successful business man. Doubtless the apparent hardship which the boy underwent enabled him to lay a foundation of that sterling character and led to large accomplishments—first in business and afterwards in politics.

This young man entered politics a few years ago, first by election to the State senate of Alabama. He there proved himself to be a wise and useful legislator, so that scarcely had his services as senator ended when he was chosen to come to this body, charged with making laws for our whole united country. He came here because he was ambitious to serve his State and country. No other inducement guided him, for he had amassed what is called a fortune in the South and a competency in any section of the country, and that, too, without ever having subjected himself even to a suspicion of a questionable dealing. Indeed, he was liberal and fair and businesslike in all his methods.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are others who know more about his business achievements than I do., I first learned to know Mr. THOMPSON well after he had entered the political arena. He did not have a collegiate education. He had little familiarity with polite literature. But he had a superior, God-given endowment. He had an incisive intellect, a quick perception, good judgment, and rare common sense. He brought all these gifts with him in his political life. It may be said of him that, perhaps, no man in this Congress has accomplished more in life, in the face of adverse circumstances, in a like number of years, than this young man accomplished. He would have been sent to the next Congress by the unanimous voice of his people. No man had dared rise up to oppose him. His death came as a shock and as grievous misfortune to his immediate constituents. Our friend has gone. We bless his memory and praise his noble qualities. We can do no more except to draw lessons and inspiration from his useful and honorable career.

He was a typical Southerner, with all his warmth of heart, with all of his impulsiveness, and with all of his courage and honesty of purpose. He loved his people. He loved his State. He loved his country. He served all of them well and faithfully. A few weeks ago we took that which was mortal of him from this city down to Alabama, and on a sunlit plain we laid him away and covered his newly made grave with a profusion of flowers. He now sleeps a sleep that shall know no wakening until the resurrection morn. Rest, dear friend, in the bosom of your beloved mother State, and in that dear old community where the aged and the young, all the people, the white and the black, revere the memory, honor the good work, and are proud of the achievements of CHARLES W. THOMPSON. We laid him away in "God's acre," in his beloved Alabama, a land so fair and blessed of heaven, where even at night, under moonlit skies and amidst the evergreen boughs of the magnolia the mocking bird sings in December.

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Speaker, death does not always come as a surprise. When by reason of extreme age or prolonged illness it claims one of our number we regard his removal as inevitable and soon become reconciled to it. It is like a reaper in a field of ripened grain, where we expect to find the golden harvest lying low after the sickle has passed. But when in the vigor of mature manhood a friend is suddenly stricken down we stand in mute surprise and are appalled. As we regain our mental poise and reflect calmly upon the situation the truth of the words so oft repeated comes to us: "In the midst of life we are in death."

Why some are taken and some are left, why the strong and vigorous fall and the frail and weak remain can no more be understood than why the lightning in the forest strikes a tree of vigorous growth and spares the one of lesser strength. These secrets are lodged only in the bosom of the Infinite, to be revealed in His own good time. In our weakness and frailty we can but speculate as to the purpose while following in a path whose course we do not know.

Little did anyone at the beginning of this session of Congress imagine that before its close we would be called upon to mourn the loss of Mr. THOMPSON. There was nothing in his appearance or manner or in the smile that played upon his face to indicate that he was soon to become a shining mark for death. It was perhaps better for him and for his friends that this unwelcome secret was veiled from sight.

It was my good fortune to become acquainted with Mr. THOMPSON soon after he entered the Fifty-seventh Congress. He was from the South—a typical southerner. He loved the South and sought to have others share his affection for her institutions. He first on coming here made his home at a hotel where all the other Members of Congress were from the North and, as a rule, belonged to a different political party. And yet it was not long until he was the friend and associate of every Member living at the hotel, stranger that he was and affiliating with another party. His gracious manner, his warm and cordial nature endeared him to everyone who came into contact with him.

Political affiliations were forgotten, sectional differences sank out of sight, and the man and friend only were seen. He had a distinct and marked individuality. He carried about him an atmosphere which charmed and drew men unto him and held them in its embrace. He was a loyal friend, not for a day only, but for all time. He was frank and open in his life. He wished others to know more about him and his surroundings. He invited as his guests people from the North to visit his home, in order that they could better understand the conditions in the South. Those who accepted his invitation and enjoyed his hospitality were charmed with the simplicity of his life and the wealth of friendship that existed for him among all classes in his own State.

He won at home as he did here, by his frank, open, and manly life. He was a faithful Representative and always loyal to his district and State. No Congressman was ever more alert to serve his constituents than Mr. THOMPSON. In his death his State and country lose a valuable Representative, his neighbors a true and loyal friend, while the loss to his family overshadows all others. And yet there comes to the stricken family a ray of hope in the thought that this son, this brother, this father has but passed out of sight, and that some time, some where, God in His goodness will bring about a reunion of mother, brother, and children, where death has no sting and the grave no victory.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, on this solemn occasion we all feel the same unfeigned regret. It is a sad duty which calls us together to-day. We come to pay our tribute and our respect to one who has gone from us.

The fate which overtook Mr. THOMPSON will sooner or later overtake us all. It is the universal law. The same summons comes with unerring certainty to the king in his palace and the peasant in his hovel. It has been so from the beginning; it will be so to the end. "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

If this is true, as it undoubtedly is, why is it that mankind remains unaccustomed to the sight; that every new recurrence brings grief to many stricken hearts? Did anyone ever go but what there was some mourner at the funeral, some heart the sadder for the going? Death is not always feared or even regretted by the dying. To many it is a relief from toil and trouble, a passing over the river to the Great Beyond with peace and thankfulness. Why, then, do the living always shudder? Why does a convenient season never come to them for a loved one to go? The answer is a mystery which Heaven has not revealed, but we all realize the truth of the impulse.

At any rate we always bow our heads in grief and drop a tear of sympathy over each new-made grave. And so to-day we meet together as a witness and a testimonial of our love and respect for our colleague and comrade who has passed over the river and rests under the shade of the trees.

The life of CHARLES W. THOMPSON is one to inspire and to lift up. Thrown upon his own resources with an unfinished education at an early age he rose to the height of every occasion. He met and solved every task; he triumphed over every difficulty. He turned his attention to business in a small town where opportunities were few, and he succeeded. The injunction, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," he obeyed to a literal degree.

Cut off as he was in the very prime and flower of a young manhood, he had succeeded in a marked degree in public life. As a member for four years in the State senate of Alabama he rendered able, conspicuous, and honorable service to his State. Elected to this Congress in November, 1900, he gave its duties here the same enthusiastic service which in private life and in the State senate had yielded such successful results. He had in a short period of three years accomplished much for the good of his people, and was making his impress felt upon national legislation. The life before him was full of promise and further usefulness. He was taken away in the very prime of life, even before his time.

No remarks upon his memory would be complete without recording the deep religious side of his nature. A member in the best standing of the Southern Methodist Church, his loss, I sincerely believe, was more widely felt by its ministers in Alabama than the loss of any of its lay members in recent years. It was well remarked by one of his friends on the occasion of his funeral services that his last public act in Alabama was to attend the conference of this church; and his last service in Washington was to attend services at the Mount Vernon Methodist Church in this city.

He died—I shall not say without regret, but certainly without fear and without complaint. He had a strong and abiding faith, even the faith of a little child. He felt it was not death at all, but simply a change. That that which was mortal was laid down, and with it pain and strife, and struggle and turmoil. That in its place was the immortal, and with it came peace and the happiness which passeth all understanding. Truly "Blessed are they who die in the Lord."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, called one day to my western home, I bade Colonel THOMPSON good-by, leaving him apparently in the full enjoyment of health. Reaching my home I found the announcement of his death.

I was deeply shocked, for I had known and loved him well. From the time that he came to Washington we dwelt under the same roof, and I had been a visitor at his home at Tuskegee. Gen. Lew Wallace, in Ben Hur, puts substantially these words into the mouth of Judith:

> There never was a people that did not think itself at least the equal of any other; never a great people that did not think itself the very superior.

Bearing this in mind, it is not to be wondered at that citizens though we be of one common country we are all of us inclined to look upon our particular section as the most favored in this land.

Born as he was at about the time of the war between the States, Colonel THOMPSON bore no bitterness in his heart arising out of that strife. The estate of his family was well-nigh wrecked by that struggle, but he set himself about to build up the affairs of his family, and he succeeded.

He had, however, deeply embedded in him the convictions and the opinions of the people of his own section. His political allegiance was with that party there dominant. His convictions upon the race problem were the convictions in large measure of his people, and yet he was broad enough to realize that if the South must forever keep the black race there it was best for the South that all possible should be made of that race.

During his service in the legislature of Alabama he did not lend his sanction to the doctrine that any human being is better for being ignorant, but gave his generous support to the doubling of State appropriations for the maintenance of the famous institution located at his home.

While loyal to every southern sentiment and loyal to every southern tradition, he was of that broad mold of Henry W. Grady, of whom it was said that when he died he was literally loving the nation into peace. His death was premature, measured by earthly standards, and yet, measured by his achievements, his life was longer than that of most of men.

His loss was felt by all who knew him, though when I heard of it I could not but feel most deeply for that dear, sweet-faced mother I had met in their home in Alabama. His sudden taking off is but another illustration of the fact that—

> There is not a wind that blows but brings with it some rainbow of promise. There is not a moment that flies but the sickle in the field of life reaps its thousands with their joys and cares.

Death was not feared to him. I never knew a man of more simple and childlike Christian character. He came to this city with deep-seated convictions upon the subject of morality and religion, and without ostentatiously advertising them he lived all his days here in strict harmony with them.

Never did he depart from that standard of conduct which had been his in his little town at home. He went out of life in the full faith that he was going to a better world beyond, and surely we may join with him in that belief that—

> Though with bowed and breaking hearts,
> With sable garb and silent tread,
> We bear his senseless dust to rest,
> We know he is not dead.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it is with feelings of profound sorrow and deep regret that I rise in this Chamber to pay a last sad tribute of respect to the memory of CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON, and to lay upon his tomb in the fair State of Alabama, in our sunny Southland, my wreath of immortelles and my garland of flowers. Not only were the ties of friendship between myself and CHARLES W. THOMPSON strong, but the ties between North Carolinians and Alabamians, between the State of North Carolina and Alabama, are especially strong and numerous. Many of Alabama's citizens are of North Carolina descent. Some of North Carolina's citizens are of Alabama descent, including distinguished Representatives from both States upon this floor. The cities of Alabama, some of them, bear the names of our North Carolina cities. The names of Greensboro and of Newbern, my home, are also the names of Alabama cities.

Since Alabama was admitted into the Union in 1819 North Carolina has contributed largely to her population, and Alabama has honored many of North Carolina's sons. The distinguished William R. King, who was born in the county of Sampson, in my Congressional district, and who formerly represented North Carolina in this House, afterwards represented Alabama in the United States Senate, and from that good State was sent as minister to France, and became Vice-President of the United States. There are now residing in Alabama many distinguished citizens of "Tar heel" ancestry; many who have removed to that State from my State. Such men as Judge Thomas Ruffin Roulhac, United States district attorney; the Hon. Hannis Taylor, minister to Spain under Mr. Cleveland's Administration, a native of Newbern, N. C., and many other men eminent at the bar and in public life. Mr. THOMPSON himself bore the name of "Winston," a prominent North Carolina family, as well as of Alabama's beloved governor, John A. Winston. These facts may account in part for my own attachment to Alabama people and to her late Representative whose memory we honor to-day.

It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, for me to find appropriate language in which to express the shock and the sadness which the news of the death of CHARLES W. THOMPSON caused me. Since I have been a Member of this body, the greatest parliamentary assembly in the world, in the brief period of three terms of service here, I have seen many of the nation's most eminent men, including a President and Vice-President of the United States and great statesmen and political leaders, pass from the stage of action. The nation and the world have mourned their departure. But many of these—yes, most of these—have vanished from the scenes of earthly glory, honor, and triumphant success in the zenith of their fame and after many years of public service.

CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON had just begun his public career. In private life he was a successful planter, banker, and business man, and had accumulated a large income. In his public life he had served Alabama in the State senate, but his political career here was just beginning; and his service in Congress was a stepping stone only to other honors, including the governorship of his State, when, in a moment, suddenly and almost without warning,

God's finger touched him and he slept.

Coming in and going out among us in this Hall, sitting by my side during this Congress, full of life, hope, and happiness, looking forward eagerly, cheerfully, joyously into the future; seeing there no shadows, only the bright sunlight of peace and success, and in the vista of the years only still wider avenues of business enterprise, still higher honors in public life, still greater joy in living; in apparent good health, death's poisoned shaft pierced him in a night, and after a brief struggle my friend succumbed to the inevitable. He met with patient resignation and fortitude the divine decree; he faced death bravely, and closing his eyes upon the changing scenes of earth fell asleep to awake in heaven's eternal morning.

Closing his earthly career in his forty-fourth year, he had won success as a business man, an educator, a legislator, and a statesman, and in every capacity he was useful and honorable, and withal a Christian gentleman, popular with all classes and conditions of people in the community in which he lived, and beloved by them all.

We have often heard it said that a man dies when his work in the world is finished. The work of CHARLES W. THOMPSON seemed just to have begun. Why was it not to be completed? Wherefore was the stately column broken? By what theory, what reason, what philosophy, do you explain the sudden termination of a bright, happy, useful, and prosperous life?

It is said that our friend contracted the disease by which he was stricken in attending devoutly the services of his church, the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Wherefore, while evil men continue to live and flourish, should a good man die? These are questions constantly recurring when death strikes down a good man at our side; questions as old as the everlasting hills, as the philosophies of ancient times, as the teachings of the heathen philosophers, Plato, Socrates, and Aristotle, as old as human life itself, yet ever new and recurring like the mystery of death. The stoic answers, "We know not; let us endure without complaint." The epicurean answers, "We know not; life is brief, its ills are many, and so while we live let us live." The Christian answers, "It is the divine will, and we bow to the divine decree."

Whatever may be the solution of this great mystery and the answer to these questions, we can find no comfort when one whom we love and esteem meets an untimely end except in the thought that God, who controls the universe, who holds in the hollow of his hand the oceans, who counts the sands upon the seashore, and numbers the stars of heaven, and yet who marks the flight and fall of the sparrow, knows what is best and does it; and though his divine decrees are immutable and mysterious, yet they affect men and nations alike and are the decrees of a loving Father.

Mr. Speaker, I am a predestinarian. I believe not that what is to be will be, but that when God wills, however untimely it may appear to us, then must events transpire and changes come in the lives of men and nations, and that his divine will is best.

The poet Whittier, in that grand poem "The eternal goodness," imagines some beautiful islands of the sea, unreal and far distant, which are full of beautiful flowers and rare exotics, and joy and peace and sunshine, where it would be ecstasy merely to exist. Realizing the sin, the suffering, passions, changes, and chances of this mortal life he longs for these beautiful islands of rest. He can not discover them, and so he patiently waits by the shore and listens for the sound of the muffled oar of the boat which is to bear him across the ocean's billows. He turns to his faith in the eternal goodness of God, exclaiming:

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I can not drift
Beyond His love and care.

It is said that "death loves a shining mark." Certainly in the sudden death of Mr. THOMPSON was this exemplified. Successful, surrounded by friends, of good habits, and with the brightest prospects, the grim destroyer selected an illustrious victim. His aim was sure, swift, and deadly, and before we realized that the end was near, and although the most skillful medical aid in the country was summoned to his bedside, almost without warning his spirit winged its flight into the great beyond. The pale boatman, with his muffled oar, bore him across the waters to those beautiful isles of the sea upon whose shores break forever and forever the waves of eternity.

CHARLES W. THOMPSON possessed besides a knowledge and aptitude for business and politics a keen appreciation of all that was good, true, and beautiful in the world. He had a refinement and sensibility which led him to love and admire the best in art, literature, nature, and mankind. His soul abhorred vice and impurity of speech. He thought no evil; he believed good of everyone. He had a cheerful optimism, a wise conservatism, a belief in God and humanity, and a love for his fellow-men: a rare combination of qualities which made him popular with men of all parties and creeds. In Congress his career and speeches were especially notable in their purpose to endeavor to unite all sections of our common country and to obliterate all sectional feeling. He appealed for just consideration and accurate knowledge of the South and southern conditions.

In an eloquent speech which he made upon southern war claims, in which he urged the repeal of the fourth section of the Bowman Act, which bars the great bulk of southern claims for supplies furnished to or taken by Federal forces in the civil war, because it makes the claimant's loyalty to the United States Government during that war essential to the validity of his claim, Mr. THOMPSON made an earnest plea for the whole people of the South, for reconciliation and peace between all sections of the country, and showed the gross injustice of northern partisans in believing and treating the South as still disloyal to the Union.

I quote one paragraph from that speech. Mr. THOMPSON said:

Southerners are as good citizens of the United States to-day as are the Northerners, and they should be treated as such by our laws. Our supplies were taken and used by the officers of the Government, and should be paid for. The South does her full share of the fighting for the Union. She does her full share of the work of the country. She bears her full share of the burdens of the country. She pays her full share of the $150,000,000 paid in pensions each year for Union soldiers. She is striving equally with the North for the honor, welfare, and advancement of the whole country. The two sections are in perfect unity, peace, and concord each with the other, and all acts inconsistent with this so desirable condition of affairs should be forthwith repealed. Think of the heroes of Georgia, Virginia, and the Carolinas in the Revolutionary war; the men who, almost starved, barefooted, and in rags, baffled the hosts of British regulars and won from them an unnumbered series of brilliant victories under Sumpter and Marion. Remember the exploits of the Southerners under Andrew Jackson in the war of 1812, under Scott and Taylor in the Mexican war, and remember that when the Spanish war broke out the Southern Confederate veterans and their sons sprang with one accord to the defense of the Stars and Stripes and fought for the flag on sea and land with unsurpassed bravery and vigor. The man who held the fort at Habana was a Southerner and a nephew of Robert E. Lee. The first one to fall in that war was a Southerner, sealing his devotion to the Union with his heart's blood.

Such sentiments as these indicate the patriotic spirit of CHARLES W. THOMPSON. Mourned by his friends, the community in which he was reared and lived, the constituency by whom he was beloved and twice elected to Congress, and by all the citizens of Alabama, the body of CHARLES W. THOMPSON has returned to the dust of his native State and his brave and kindly soul to the God who gave it. May he rest in peace in Alabama's soil, there to await the resurrection morning and the "rising of the Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the power of a great nation does not depend alone upon armies and fleets and the extent of its territory, but upon the honesty and worth and enthusiasm of its citizens. The material progress of a country depends to a large extent upon the integrity of the men who are elected to public office.

CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON believed always in the idea that a public office is a public trust, which must always be administered with the same appreciation of the responsibilities involved as is required in the transaction of the ordinary business affairs of life.

As a Member of the Congress of the United States and in all the minor political offices he at various times filled he discharged his duties honestly, faithfully, and fearlessly, and with the same zeal and integrity that always characterized his transactions in the numerous business activities in which he was engaged.

He brought with him to this House all the enthusiasm of his young manhood. He has left here the impress of a strong, manly personality. Upon such men as CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON depends, to a large extent, the welfare and material progress of our country.

He was born in the Southland when the two sections of our country were contending in the greatest civil war the world ever saw. He lived out his young manhood surrounded by the evidence of the changed and constantly changing conditions brought about by that conflict. The traditions of centuries had been destroyed. The labor system of great States had been overturned.

Amid the chaos which followed the war he grew to manhood. Living in the center of the "black belt" of Alabama, he had opportunities for the study of social conditions such as were presented to but few men. Fighting always, even in early youth, with a manful courage the battle of life, he soon learned to appreciate fully the difficulties which presented themselves in the attempt to solve the race problem in the South.

His material affairs prospered, and he was able to give much time to the study of this most important question. He made it his life work. The locality in which he lived was peculiarly fitted to develop in him the ideas he sought to impress upon Congress and upon the country.

The emancipation of the negro had left that race largely preponderating in his section. On account of this fact the great Tuskegee Institute was located there. This great institution, officered by negroes, has been successfully striving to uplift the race by training them in the industrial occupations. He was in entire sympathy with this work and rendered at all times valuable assistance.

Here in the village of Tuskegee he resided during all the years of his life. He has contributed much toward the solution of this great economic problem.

He was loved by all who knew him. His bright, cheerful disposition made him armies of friends wherever he went, among both the white and the black races.

> Sunshine was he in the winter day,
> And in the summer, coolness and shade.

He was an honest, conscientious, enthusiastic, forceful man of action, always in the full possession of all his faculties. Such a man is the grandest object this world ever exhibits. To use the words of a great American orator, "The heavens in their magnificence, the ocean in its sublime immensity, mountains standing firm upon their granite foundations, all are less imposing than a living man in the possession of his highest faculties."

We have assembled here to-day to do honor to the memory of an honest, thoughtful man, who in his lifetime was a potent factor in the solution of great economic questions. Such a man while he lives is an inspiration to all who come within the sphere of his influence—

> And when he dies he leaves a lofty name;
> A light, a landmark on the cliffs of fame.

The work he attempted to do can not be arrested by the cold hand of death. He started into forceful motion activities which will not stop with his death. Fifteen hundred years ago barbarians attempted to remove from the earth the influence of Athenian sculpture and they mutilated and buried the old Greek statues; but these great works of art live again, and during all the centuries have "kissed into being with their cold lips of marble" successive generations of artists, who have made the world ever more beautiful and have developed and uplifted human ideals.

Such a man as CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON lights up this old cheerless world and glorifies all he undertakes with bright hues brought down from heaven.

He was a true son of the Southland. He loved her history and her traditions; he loved the locality in which he was born and had always lived.

He loved the flowers and the bright skies and the singing birds of his native State. He loved her almost perpetual summer, her balmy breezes, and her broad smiling landscapes. He loved the people who live there—young and old, white and black; he loved them all, and they loved him.

Death came in the full flush of youthful manhood, when for him the sun was still shining in the eastern sky and had not yet approached the meridian. Death is always sad, but it is less sad when the shadows of evening are gathering, and when a man has lived out the years of his mature manhood and is entering upon the infirmities of old age.

He died here in this capital at his post of duty, a victim to the severity of an unusually cold winter in Washington. I was one of the Members of this body who accompanied his remains to his native village. As the long train moved swiftly across parallels of latitude we soon began to realize that we had left behind us the land of snow and cold and were entering upon the sunny Southland.

I shall never forget the impressive scene which followed our arrival in his native village. The night was not far advanced, and from miles around his old friends had come to pay their tribute to his memory.

I can see yet the long procession up the village street, the heartfelt grief of his family and of the friends of his own race, the long lines of black men and women who stood respectfully, with uncovered heads, as we passed.

It was glorious springtime in the Southland. The air was laden with the fragrance of flowers; from the orchards came the song of the mocking bird. It was the season he loved best. CHARLIE THOMPSON had come home—back to the country he loved and to the people who loved him.

We covered his grave with flowers and left him there in the land he loved, under the blue sky of his native State, where the flowers bloom and the birds sing and the balmy breezes forever blow from the southern gulf.

[Mr. BURNETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, once more an angel messenger delivered his message to the House of Representatives, and the late CHARLES W. THOMPSON responded and took his departure. We have assembled upon this holy Sabbath afternoon to speak a word of just tribute to his memory and his works. He and I entered Congress at the beginning of the Fifty-seventh Congress. During that Congress I only knew him as a Member of the House. In the Fifty-eighth Congress we were assigned to work upon the Banking and Currency Committee, and there I knew him better and had more association with him.

In speaking of him to-day, however, I shall speak less of what I know myself and more of what those who knew him better and had had longer association with him testified to his worth and his merits; to speak that impression that he made upon me and what I believed he was, in truth and in fact. First of all, I desire to say that he was a man of deep religious conviction. To say that he was a member of the church is not enough. True, he was a devoted member of the church, but there is more than church membership. In his heart, in his soul, in his being there was a deep, earnest conviction of his duty, his obligations, and his relationship to his God. He believed in the Fatherhood of God, not abstractly, not simply that God was the Creator in the abstract of all things, but in the concrete that he was the Father of the human race.

It is a good thing, Mr. Speaker, to lodge in the human heart a belief in the fatherhood of God, and CHARLES W. THOMPSON had a deep and earnest and sincere conviction in this belief, and this belief made itself manifest in his life, in his conduct, and in his character. Again, Mr. Speaker, he was a man of broad humanitarian sympathies. All of us have our sympathies, all of us have our charitable thoughts, our kindly affections, our love for our friends, but there is more in life, there is more in sympathy than affection for an individual or kindness to a particular person.

There is a breadth, there is a broadness, there is a comprehensiveness in sympathy that reaches out and touches humanity, and CHARLES W. THOMPSON had that sympathy. He believed in the brotherhood of man. He touched elbows with humanity; his heart responded to the noble sentiments, the deep sympathy, the abiding confidence in the integrity, in the worth, and in the merit of humanity, and it was this belief, it was this broad humanitarian sympathy inspiring his life that interprets and sheds light upon his character and upon his worth as a man, as a citizen, and as a legislator.

He was also a successful man in the material business affairs of life, a man of sobriety, a man of energy, a man of industry, a man who properly and wisely appreciated the virtues that enter into and constitute the elements of life and of character. He did not believe that character was a haphazard matter, but he realized that it was constituted of elements, essential elements without which life was a failure, and that these elements of character were the virtues of life, and he put these virtues into practice.

He was not satisfied simply to believe in virtues, in the elements of character in the abstract, but he had a desire and an ambition to exemplify and illustrate these virtues in his daily walk, in his conversation, in the mode and the manner of his living and moving among men. As the result of this he enjoyed the confidence, the love, and the respect of the people of his home land and of his colleagues and associates in this Chamber. I shall not dwell upon that. Others who knew him longer and had associated more with him have borne witness to that phase of his life.

Let me only add that a man moved by such impulses, inspired by such inspirations, knew and realized and proved that "life is more than meat and the body is more than raiment."

I was one of the committee of this House appointed to attend his funeral at his home in Alabama. The esteem and respect of the people of his native State was indeed a beautiful and inspiring tribute to his worth and a noble monument to his memory.

In the midst of life death came to him, and he left us; and we stand here to-day asking ourselves why. Is death the end? If so, our aspirations are barren; our inspirations are fruitless. If death is the end, why should we cultivate the intellect to sweep out over a universe, to gather in the knowledge and the glory and the grandeur of creation? If death is the end, why should we fill our hearts with the inspirations of love? Why should we link and bind our lives with the ties of friendship and hallowed association, if it all comes to naught? If death is the end, why should we not seek only to gratify that within the grasp of our senses?

It is standing in the contemplation of scenes like this, in the shadow of lives like that of Mr. THOMPSON, that we can rise in the dignity of manhood, in the glory of such a character, and say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth and that after this life I shall see God."

'Tis life, not death, I crave; more life, richer life, would I have. Here in this life, hemmed in by the senses, able to communicate only through the limited and narrow channels and avenues of sense; over there, untrammeled by the limitations of our physical senses in the life which he enjoys, we are in touch with the eternities—the eternities of time, the eternities of space, the eternities of opportunity, the eternities of accomplishment.

Oh, the little time that is allowed us here, when our ambitions, our calculations, our aims, and our purposes are cut short as illustrated by the life of this man! Encompassed by the limitations of time, the limitations of space, our sphere of action is so narrow we can extend our associations and friendships and obligations and duties only over a little territory.

Here opportunity, it is said, comes to us once only, and then it seems that we accomplish in the full, rounded, perfected sense so little. Is it not a comfort, as we measure life and character by such a standard as the life and character of this man, to find consolation in the thought of the life beyond, in the eternities of our opportunities and our accomplishments? Verily, these are the grandeur and the glory and the power of life.

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, some one has truthfully said: "It is a pious office to scatter sweets over the tomb of departed worth." For that purpose we are met to-day. CHARLES W. THOMPSON is no longer a Member of this great American Congress, but his comrades on both sides of this Chamber esteem it a melancholy pleasure to turn from acrimonious debate and place among the archives of the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress their testimonials as to the character and worth of the lamented dead.

The death of our friend is another startling proof of the uncertainty of life. Neither exalted position nor wealth furnish any immunity against this dread visitation. Our friend had both, but in spite of that and in spite of the services of skilled physicians, CHARLES W. THOMPSON heard a call that he could not disobey; his spirit passed beyond the shadows and mists of time, and his body sleeps in the land of his birth, where from day to day his dusty couch is watered by the tears of generous love.

I met Mr. THOMPSON at the opening of the Fifty-seventh Congress. We took the oath of office at the same time, I believe, lived at the same hotel, and sat near each other in this Hall. So I had some opportunity of knowing him.

I believe there is no life in which a man more surely makes his own place and maps out his own course than in this body. As some one remarked here in debate a few days ago, it matters not what a man may have been at home, no matter what social or political distinctions he may have won in some other arena, or what ability he may have shown in some other forum, when he becomes a Member of the House of Representatives he will be judged by the record he makes here.

Mr. THOMPSON attracted men not by brilliant speech or self-assertiveness, but rather by his gentleness and conservatism. He was a manly man. His was a bright face that wore a cheery smile, sure token of a genial, happy disposition, and a mind that entertained high ideals. The world is a mirror that reflects back our own image. Smile, and it smiles at you; weep, and it shows a tearful countenance. Changing the figure, some one has said that the world is a savings bank from which we can draw out only what we put in. No wonder, then, that our dead friend saw love and beauty and joy and gladness in the world, and wore a smile and had a hearty hand shake for those he met. He was in love with the world around him and with his fellow-men, and the world was in love with Mr. THOMPSON. He gave to his fellowmen the warmth of his sunny nature and they paid him back in his own coin.

As a legislator he was studious and purposeful. His ambition was to do right. A Southerner, he was typical of that section—loyal to its traditions and proud of its history. But he was not provincial; he was an American and loved the whole Union. As a business man he was unusually successful, and yet he was neither a bigot nor a Shylock. He gave his goods to feed the poor, and was delighted to be a steward of his Lord's money.

I had the honor of being one of the Congressional escort that went with his body to his much-loved Alabama home. It was a sad mission. The immense concourse of people, representing all classes and conditions, that followed his body to the grave was an eloquent tribute to his worth, and showed the esteem in which he was held by his neighbors. Only two weeks before he had told friends and loved ones good-by, after a brief visit to his home, and had, in apparently perfect health, resumed his duties here. Life seemed to spread out before him and years beckoned him forward. But he fell in the zenith of his manly strength, with the sun of life at high meridian. Measured by the highest standard of manhood, his life was not so short after all, for "he lives longest who lives best."

Let me speak briefly now of the most striking phase of Mr. THOMPSON'S character. He was not ashamed of the gospel of Christ and esteemed it an honor to be reckoned among the children of God.

The average man can easily conform to the requirements of the moral law at home, surrounded by Christian influences, but many men become lax in the observance of religious duty when they come to the capital and go with the multitude to do evil. Not so with our departed friend. We are told that the first Sunday after he arrived in Washington, at the opening of the Fifty-seventh Congress, he went to the church of his choice, the Methodist Episcopal Church South, put himself under the charge of the pastor, and then, Sunday after Sunday, when in Washington, he was found among the worshipers. No, he was not ashamed to be called a Christian.

When the shadows lengthened and the death dews settled on his pallid brow he told the minister, "I am not afraid to die." Who does not envy such heroism?

The great and wise of earth have weighed the planets, measured their orbits, and determined their revolutions; but none have been able to raise the shadows that hang around the tomb or say where will rest the soul when freed from this mortal casket.

And yet our friend, soothed and sustained by an unfaltering trust in God, approached the King of Terrors in this final conflict and was not afraid.

He had heard "songs in the silence," and the God whom he had served forsook him not in that hour. Crowns and coronets, scepters and robes of office give no guaranty against the icy touch of death or any title to rest and home and life and joy beyond the grave. But in spite of wealth and high position and the seductive influences of official life, our friend had found the "open sesame."

Peace, peace, sweet peace,
Wonderful gift from above—
Oh, wonderful, wonderful peace,
Sweet peace, the gift of God's love.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, we stand in the shadow of a great sorrow. Again we are impressed with the solemn words of the poet:

Oh, deep, enchanting prelude to repose,
The dawn of bliss, the twilight of our woes;
Yet half I hear the panting spirit sigh
It is a dread and awful thing to die.

Ebon-handed Death, with his relentless scythe, has again invaded our ranks and cut down a beloved colleague in the full pride and strength of a glorious young manhood.

On the 20th day of last month, at the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., his disembodied spirit winged its flight from the ills of life to a brighter and better home beyond the skies, to that—

Mysterious world, untraveled by the sun,
Where time's far-wandering tide has never run.

In this untimely death the State mourns one of her stronge and noblest sons. His illness was brief. Grief-stricken, we scarcely had occasion to gather around his sick bed before we were summoned to follow his body to the grave.

So buoyant and manly, strong and healthy, brave, loyal, and true was he that it never occurred to us to associate him with the idea of death. Better than any man I ever knew he appreciated the just relations between himself and others, the duties arising from them, and his obligations at all times to fulfill them.

I was his intimate personal friend and loved him for those qualities of head and heart which endeared him to all who came into close contact with him. As a father, son, brother, neighbor, friend, church member, and patriotic citizen he discharged every duty cheerfully and with the approval of a good conscience.

Time robs us of our treasures one by one, leaving us nothing save our dead. The ways of God are inscrutable—past finding out. In the midst of a useful and honorable career, with a rainbow of promise spanning a brilliant future and glowing with prismatic colors of richest hue, it is beyond our finite comprehension to understand why the "dread summons" should come to him at an hour so inopportune. All our sorrows, it is said, have elements of good in them, and as "the swift shuttle passes" we catch bright glimpses of golden threads in the black web of our afflictions. Light and shade, good and evil, joy and sadness, sickness and health, life and death, cross and recross like warp and woof in the loom and weave up the eternal network of our destiny. But—

Each hope and fear that blights the eye or clouds the brow
Proclaims there is a happier sphere than this bleak world that holds us now.

From the almost inspired pen of Edmund Burke we have this memorable sentiment: "There is nothing in the world that does not lie within the reach of an informed understanding and a well-directed pursuit." The moral qualities, the excellencies of character, of brave and loyal men have caused the torch of truth to come down from heaven to earth. Truth and courage are lordly virtues. They wear upon their heads the dignity and glory of kingly power; and when softened by charity, which is their loving mother, they become the superb crown of humanity—not imperious despots, but checked and tempered sovereigns of the soul.

CHARLES W. THOMPSON was a broad-gauged, progressive, liberty-loving American. He was not a theorist or pessimist. He was no literary vagrant, loitering about the soft places of indolence and ease. He was intensely practical. He did things. He accomplished results. With a Napoleonic grasp of the situation, he reached conclusions with unerring accuracy and apparently without conscious intermediate process. Earnestly patriotic, his ardent wish was to have all sectional lines obliterated, to behold the North, South, East, and West banded together in the common bonds of perpetual union and fraternal love. Direct in his methods, clear of comprehension, with a bright mind full of useful knowledge, fluent in speech, and graceful in manner, it was no marvel that in his public addresses he became so interesting and instructive that "the common people heard him gladly."

The Bible description of a Christian worker, "not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord," precisely fitted him. He met the duties, responsibilities, and obligations of life with truth and courage, honor and manhood. It is the rugged highway that calls forth one's strength and not the valleys of sensuous ease. The fierce winds drive the roots of the giant oak deep down into the earth, so that it may resist the raging storms. Carlyle defined genius to be "a light of intelligence, of truth, and of all manfulness." This sort of genius craves recognition and appreciation. Merit does not voluntarily hide itself from the knowledge of men. It will live through the fires of persecution. It will break the shackles of ignorance, superstition, and prejudice. It will stand firm against adversity's howling tempests. Even prison walls and iron bars can not shut out its influence.

It was a doctrine of old paganism that the gods gave nothing to mortals without severe toil. Acting upon the principle that labor conquers all things and "time will bring its own reward," the splendid gentleman whose death we mourn to-day struck out for himself in the great ocean of busy life around him and struggled heroically with its waves. He proved himself strong and worthy; and his fellow-men were not slow in making the discovery, in properly appreciating his efforts, and in rewarding him according to his deserts. From obscurity to fame he fought his way, and his career demonstrates and illustrates the magnificent possibilities of American citizenship.

With a modest beginning in his native town of Tuskegee, he amassed a large fortune before he reached the age of 40 years. He did not enter the political arena until he had already achieved notable business successes. The first official position he held was that of State senator, and while serving in that capacity he was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress in a hotly contested race. He was returned to the Fifty-eighth Congress by a large majority, and would have been reelected without opposition to the Fifty-ninth Congress but for his sudden death. He was peculiarly adapted to public life. Enthusiastic in his affections, generous in nature, magnanimous in disposition, benevolent and public-spirited, tactful in the management of men and measures, tireless in energy, patient and painstaking in the conquest of details, he possessed, in addition to these characteristics, a magnetic personality, which enabled him to triumph in all his undertakings without surrendering one "jot or tittle" of his honest convictions.

Doctor Johnson has somewhere said: "He whose life has passed without a contest, who can neither boast success nor merit, and is content with his own character, must owe his satisfaction to his insensibility." There is not a person on earth who has not in him the power to do good. What men want is not talent so much as purpose; not so much the ability to achieve as the will to labor.

In little circles, it may be, we gather about us those who are bound to us by ties of affection or cemented by common rights and mutual interests. A man can not live for himself alone. Our fallen friend was literally the "archimedean lever" that moved the social, commercial, and religious thought and action of the community in which he was born. He had, of course, battles to fight and victories to win. He encountered difficulties and conquered them. He faced obstacles and surmounted them. A tree is known by the fruit it bears. A man is judged by the product of his labor.

According to every standard known to human experience by which earthly fame is measured we are forced to rank him among those who have compassed large results; but the make-up of this remarkable man can not be understood, nor a proper estimate be put upon his life and character, without taking into account the beneficent influence his devoted Christian mother exercised in his moral and religious training.

It was Madame de Stael who told Napoleon Bonaparte that if he wished to regenerate France he must first regenerate her mothers. A nation's glory or shame begins at the lullaby cradle, fondly rocked by an anxious mother's hand. It is an indisputable fact that scarcely any man has ever attained distinction in his chosen sphere who was not reared by a consecrated mother.

The tender love and consideration he always manifested for his mother was beautiful to contemplate. How proud she was of her worthy son—the idol of her heart, the "apple of her eye," and what a cruel blow was struck her when the "still small voice" coming from the realm of shade fell upon his ear and whispered: "Child of the dust, come away—come away."

When he left her to attend to his Congressional duties at Washington, imprinting a kiss upon her aged lips, health bloomed in his cheeks and joy laughed in his eyes; only two weeks later when he returned to her his body lay in a coffin. His image deep graven on her broken heart will remain "till memory be dead." He was her prop and support—her stay and hope. She had directed his youthful mind and guided his erring footsteps, and now, in her declining years, she delighted to lean on his loving breast; and he never failed her. His staff was her "comfort."

He was essentially a busy man; yet in the hurry and bustle incident to an active life he found time for the distribution of charities and benefactions with a liberal hand. He did not deem it a weakness to give sway to the influence of loving and sympathetic emotions. He preserved in his warm heart some green spots where the caravan wheels of the world never passed and where the hoofs of its carnival coursers never trod. His benevolences made life beautiful to many sorrow-stricken souls, bringing to them flowers and music and good cheer, and pouring into their weary hearts light and gladness, and sunshine.

But he has left us forever. Death, who knocks alike at the palaces of the rich and the cottages of the poor, unwilling to await the fruition of his earthly endeavors, has called this faithful public servant, this genial and gentle friend, "from labor to rest;" but he has not died in vain. His good deeds will live after him and inspire the youth of the land to emulate his well-rounded character. He leaves to the nation and his native State, to his family, kindred, and friends the legacy of an unsullied name. We mourn for a comrade lost; we grieve for a friend that is gone; but we will cherish the memory of his noble life, and emulate those lustrous virtues which incited him to lofty aspirations in his works and aims during his pilgrimage on earth, in his daily walk amongst his fellow-men. They have builded for him "a monument not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have not spoken, but who may desire to submit remarks upon the life and character of CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON, have leave to print in the RECORD within such time as is usual.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

DEATH OF HON. WILLIAM W. SKILES.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolusions, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM W. SKILES, late a Member of this House from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the beautiful eulogies that have been pronounced upon the dead and distinguished Member from Alabama [Mr. THOMPSON], and a thought has come to me that it is wise that we should assemble in a session of the House to speak of the character and virtues of those who have gone before. There is too much of censure and too little of intelligence in considering and discussing our public men. One will not find among the body of men comprising this House many who have not come here because of some strong, attractive, and valuable personal characteristic. So it is well that their careers shall be described and their virtues proclaimed, their successes made known. It will be an incentive to the young men of the future and an assurance to the people of the present.

I speak for a very few moments of the life and character of our colleague, WILLIAM WOODBURN SKILES, of Ohio. His death was untimely; it came when he was apparently just upon the threshold of a great career. He fell at the post of duty. He fell when he was being honored and appreciated by his fellows and when the door of ambition was open before him, when he was zealously pushing his way to usefulness and influence. He was born in the State of Pennsylvania in 1849, was taken to Ohio, and settled in Richland County, a county of fine farms, intelligent men, good people, loyal friends of civilization. He was educated and grew up to manhood, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1878. He had been married about a year before. He diligently and faithfully pursued the practice of law from the time of his admissi n to the Ohio bar until the time of his death. He never sought office, never held any office of any importance until he was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress. He was a strong, able, well-educated, well-trained lawyer, a man who had the confidence and esteem of the bar and bench of Ohio in the fullest degree. I speak, of course, of those who knew him. He was an admirable advocate. His arguments to the court were powerful; his addresses to the jury were forceful, eloquent, and able. He was a faithful lawyer. He was one of those lawyers who devote themselves to the interests of their clients. Honorable, high-minded, above all suspicion of the shyster, he was a straightforward gentleman. So devoted to the interests of his clients was he that he attracted my attention in a matter in which he took deep interest during the last few months of his life. He had in his hands the interests of a client whom he believed was threatened with a great wrong and injustice, and he labored persistently while in Washington, scanning all the evidence, studying carefully the law of the case. I myself became greatly interested in the case, for I felt—learning from him more than all I knew before—that injustice was probably threatened; and his appeal to the executive of Ohio was made with the conscientious belief that it was the only salvation for his friend and client. He was engaged in a struggle for that client when he fell at the hands of death.

The last act of his life was at the peril of his life; the last effort he made was a fatal effort. He left there because of his client and was hurried to his home only to fall under the hands of disease. As I have said, he was well educated, a man who kept in touch with the progress of the affairs of his State and his country. He was a faithful party man. He was not an offensive partisan, but a good partisan. He believed in party organization; he believed that a man could do more good for his country through the organization of a party than he could do by any independent action of his own. And that is the true philosophy of American government. Our Government is a government by parties, and the government of party consists in the organization of party and the fidelity of the membership to party and to party organization. No man in this country, if I may be allowed a slight digression, has ever risen to a position where he has benefited his country and done good to mankind on his own hook. Free governments are not administered by guerrillas, and guerrillas are as distasteful and harmful to popular government in time of peace as they are distasteful to the soldier in time of war.

Mr. SKILES was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress by a large majority in a district, however, that gives a large majority to the party to which he belonged. He was a popular candidate, an able and efficient candidate, a candidate who challenged and received the honor and respect of his partisan opponents. He was a candidate who treated his opponents with consideration, respect, and regard, and they esteemed him and believed in him, notwithstanding the principles that he represented. In the town where he lived, Shelby, Ohio, he was popular. I was unable to attend his funeral, but I am told that there was a significant demonstration of love and affection which testified in the strongest possible degree to the high standing that he held in the community. I know that his standing in the State at large was the standing of a citizen highly respected and highly honored. His home life was beautiful. His love and affection for his wife was significant and happy. His family around him loved and honored him, and they weep with both affection and pride because of his untimely death and of his career.

He was making his way in Congress. He had suffered illness here which retarded his progress, but he was making his way. He was able, he was clear-headed, he was intelligent, and he was ambitious. Those are the elements that go to make Congressmen successful. Personally, I think that the greatest of these is ambition, because I believe in ambition. I believe the man who is ambitious to rise is the man who will do all that is necessary to challenge and receive the respect and confidence of his fellows. His death, therefore, was untimely. It is my belief that he would have been reelected to the Fifty-ninth Congress; and if he had, I am confident he would have overcome a sort of unwritten, and what to me seems an unfortunate, law of some of our districts in Ohio, that a man elected to Congress may be there but for two terms and that then he shall be relegated to the rear—a fatal defect in our system, something that makes us many times weaker than we would be if common sense and good judgment prevailed. I believe that in his case he would have grown and overcome any such obstacle, if that obstacle existed, and I had hoped to see him a distinguished and prominent Member of Congress. Had he lived, I have no doubt that my wish would have been realized.

But he is dead and gone, Mr. Speaker. His record is made up. It is a good record, and one of which his family may well be proud and his fellows may well approve. I have no time nor disposition to discuss the philosophy of death. I can not understand any more than any other man or all men put together why it is that the men most valuable, most wanted here, die first. I can not understand how a young man, as THOMPSON of Alabama, whose life and character have to-day been eulogized, or a strong man like SKILES, should die, while old men, men too old for activity, are left behind. God knows, and some day, as we have so often heard to-day, we may know all about it.

I do not know now, and no philosophy can teach me and no study of books can enlighten me—no dogma of religion can throw upon it any light. So I am willing to submit to the decrees of a benevolent Heavenly Father. With blind faith—for that is what all of our faith must come to at last—in the goodness of God and the wisdom of His administration of affairs, His careful meting out of all that is right and just and desirable to us, I shall abide my time and believe that when men like THOMPSON and SKILES and HANNA fall there is some good reason for it, and that some day I perhaps may know what it is. If I do not, it will make little difference, for I shall still have confidence—blind confidence, if you please—in the wisdom of the power that is administering these events.

We shed our tears figuratively over the grave of our departed colleague; we tender to his loving wife and family our sincere condolence and regard, and may his shining example, his bright career, be an incentive to those he has left behind, and in the fullness of time may they come to appreciate that virtue, honor, integrity, patriotism, and uprightness will secure the approbation of the people.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly fitting that one who has been a Representative in this body and in the midst of the performance of his public duties has been called hence that those who knew him intimately should attest their appreciation of his character and here embody in permanent form the salient features of his life. It was my privilege to be numbered in that class. During the Fifty-seventh Congress Representative SKILES and myself boarded at the same hotel, sat at the same table, and during a portion of the time his son was my private secretary.

Thus I came to know him intimately; not only him but all his family. Little by little the incidents of his career were unfolded to me as well as his social and domestic life. He was not one who carried his heart upon his sleeve. He was not voluble in conversation. He did not volunteer information about himself. He had no self-conceit. He never boasted of his achievements. There was no vain glorification in his conversation. He did not consider it necessary to assert himself to secure his own advancement.

He knew his limitations, and while not deprecating his own abilities had a self-reliant confidence that asserted itself when necessary for the accomplishment of the end he had in view. He took a broad view of every matter in which he was interested. He adopted the simplest and most natural methods to accomplish his purposes. Thus as time rolled on, slowly, but surely, he laid the foundations of a useful, honorable, and eminently successful life. He was a farmer's boy. His youthful vision saw the broad Ohio fields and the woods and streams around him where nature only could impress its lessons.

The district school, with its rudimentary instruction, must have afforded a desultory education only. A better education was the home associations of the farm itself, for the strong men, the patriotic men, the men of energy, the men who have become leaders in public and industrial life are, as a rule, those brought up under the inspiration of the mountains around them or the plains that stretch for miles beyond the homestead. Here ambition is inspired and indomitable resolution to succeed implanted.

Such was the effect upon him, for largely by his own efforts he secured the means to complete a course in Baldwin University at Berea, Ohio, from which he graduated in 1876. Admitted to the bar that year, he cast about for a place in which to locate. Naturally he would have selected a city or a large town in which to practice. A country village in modern times offers no inducement even to the young practitioner.

It is not merely that litigation in such places is discountenanced, which perhaps is not an evil, but because where invested capital is lacking and manufacturing or mercantile business is on a small scale there is no occasion for a lawyer's services. His cases will be trivial and his fees gauged by the amount involved. There are few occasions for consultation, and his office is apt to become the rendezvous of the idle classes or the village politician.

Yet such a place was selected by our friend in Shelby, at that time an unpretentious town. He builded better than he knew. Did he foresee its future, when large manufacturing firms and corporations should extend its borders? Was it among his ambitions even then that he could so identify himself with its development as to be an integral part of it himself?

Whether or no, such was the case, for scarcely an industry of importance was established in which his was not one of the guiding hands. He joined the societies and associations of the town, took an active part in their deliberations, did yeoman's work in them all, and served the people for years as one of their school committee. All this was done not for self-interest, but as a duty.

> The sweetest lives are those to duty wed,
> Whose deeds both great and small
> Are close-knit strands of an unbroken thread
> Where love ennobles all.
> The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells;
> The book of life the shining record tells.

Nor did he ever forget that he was but one of the common people. He climbed rung by rung the ladder of fame with unconquered energy, but he never made his own aggrandizement his master. He was the genial companion and friend. As he strolled down the streets of Shelby he met all sorts and conditions of men. He met them on common ground. For all he had a dignified but winning presence and the outstretched hand. There was no assumption of superiority.

For the poor and suffering he was kind, sympathetic, and charitable. The needy have often been the recipients of his unostentatious benevolence. For him neither wealth nor poverty made the man. The honesty, the intention, the character—these determined his judgment, so that as the years sped on the simplicity and uprightness of his own character made a profound impression in his adopted town.

Early in his legal practice he was associated in partnership with his brother, and the association continued to the end. As previously stated, the field was too narrow and limited for his capacity. There was little promise for the future. His restless mind first turned to the enlargement of business opportunities in Shelby and, when its commercial and financial interests were assured, to the enlargement of his own. He took up the adjustment and trial of railroad accidents as a specialty, and so successful was his firm that they soon acquired a monopoly of this line of business in the surrounding country.

Clients came to the country town, passing the great cities, to seek his counsel. The firm became the foremost in this specialty in the county, with a most remarkable business, considering the circumstances, surpassed, indeed, by but few even in the largest cities in the State. So keen were his perceptions, so accurate his legal application of principles, so just his conclusions that in his latter years few cases actually came to trial, but were settled by argument with the opposing party.

It is as a legislator we have known him. He did not participate in the debates of this House. He cared apparently nothing for the acclaim the orator receives. Those who have listened to his public addresses assert that his views were presented always in a clear, concise, and logical manner, depending more upon hard facts and reasoning than eloquent periods or impassioned appeals. Details were easily mastered by him, and for this reason he was a very valuable representative in the committee room and most useful to his constituents. It was his wish that Judge A. R. Webber, of Elyria, Ohio, should succeed him, and yesterday Judge Webber was nominated as his successor.

His death came as a shock, for he had recovered from severe illness in the spring and seemed in vigorous health. What a demonstration at his obsequies! Æneas in the plutonian shades saw the shadowy forms of the philosophers, the warriors, the heroes, and gods of mythological antiquity pass by. He sought to seize their elusive forms. At last as Marcellus came near and smiled upon him he exclaimed: "Oh, give to me the lilies and the purple flowers, that I may strew them on Marcellus's grave." So the churches, the societies, the bar, the people almost literally strewed with flowers his pathway to the grave. Seven thousand and seventy-five persons passed by to gaze for the last time upon his mortal body.

He was at rest; that rest which he had longed for when the summons came; for if the disembodied spirit can look down from the battlements of heaven, his spirit looks down upon us to-day, saying, in the words so often repeated by him when living, and which illustrated both his life and death:

> So live, that when thy summons comes to join
> The innumerable caravan which moves
> To that mysterious realm where each shall take
> His chamber in the silent halls of death,
> Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
> Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
> By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
> Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. HILDEBRANT. Mr. Speaker, for the second time on this Sabbath day, a day which has been appropriately dedicated to the paying of tributes to those who once labored here with us and who have gone before into the spirit realm, I arise to briefly call to remembrance the life and character of our late friend and colleague, WILLIAM WOODBURN SKILES, and in thus doing deserved honor to him, may we who survive him try to learn lessons from his life that may help us as we march along life's highway, whither he has gone.

Mr. Speaker, the necrology of Congress in recent years is alarming, and it brings forcibly to our minds the statement that verily "in the midst of life we are in death." Among her representatives Ohio has furnished a fruitful field for the grim harvester, for to-day not one, but two, of her sons—one a Senator and the other a Representative—whose lives were full of deeds that add to the fame of their State, to the glory of the nation, and honor to themselves, are being paid the respect that is their due.

WILLIAM WOODBURN SKILES was born and raised in the fertile valley of the Cumberland, in the State of Pennsylvania, and at a tender age went with his parents to the home in Ohio where was to be the theater of his life's work and where, also, he was to end his earthly labors.

Like a great many of our American boys, he went to district schools, and later enjoyed the benefits of a liberal higher education at Baldwin University. He became a lawyer, and practiced his profession with his brother, at Shelby, Ohio. Mr. SKILES'S reputation as a deep-thinking, able, and conscientious lawyer was not confined to his home or his county. It extended to the larger field of jurisprudence in the State of Ohio at large, and here in Congress he was considered a man of exceptional legal training and ability. In this his second term the honor came to him of presiding over one of the most important committees of the House—the Committee on Patents; but before he had fairly entered upon the discharge of his duties as such death claimed him. Had he lived, I confidently expected him to bring to bear in the field of patent law such a fund of knowledge and such sound judgment as would stamp him as one of the leading lawyers in the House, if, indeed, he had not already, in his comparatively short service, won that distinction.

Mr. SKILES went about the affairs of life in a thoroughly self-contained way, as seemingly always sure of his ground, for, being a deep thinker and close reasoner, he never acted except upon well-prepared plans. This characteristic rendered him valuable in the councils of his party in Ohio, as well as in diversified fields of business activity, for Mr. SKILES, besides being a lawyer and a politician, was also a manufacturer and a financier. His personal appearance denoted the man of affairs, and his almost massive head told of great intellectuality. His election to Congress was the natural trend of a man of his parts. He was built to be a lawmaker, and that he was cut off right in the midst of his labors, when he was just beginning to demonstrate his usefulness and value, is a great loss to the country as it is to his constituency.

Although he did not live out the allotted three score years and ten, his life was as full of deeds as though he had gone to the limit, and few men manage to crowd into their lives more things of a substantial character that last beyond the fitful and evanescent life of man than did Mr. SKILES. Such a life as his was worth living because he lived for something. He took hold of life, and with all his physical might and all his mental strength turned to good account the talents with which he was endowed; and in doing this he made for himself a good name, to which we here to-day, who would do him honor, can add nothing. His life work, well done, is his monument.

His fellow-men profited by what WILLIAM WOODBURN SKILES was, because what he was and what he did, in each and all the pursuits in which he was engaged, whether as lawyer or as banker, whether as manufacturer or as Congressman, whether as politician or as home builder, or whether as private citizen or public man in any capacity, stood for what is best in a Christian nation and for what is best in a country like ours, which must of necessity be built upon such men as my late colleague was in order to insure its perpetuity.

The love and esteem in which the friends and neighbors of Mr. SKILES held him was amply testified by their general and unmistakably sincere sorrow, when, at Shelby, Ohio, his home, the people turned out and came from far and near to pay their last tribute to their friend, their benefactor, and their honored and highly respected Representative. I was privileged to attend the funeral of Mr. SKILES as one of the committee on the part of the House, and I was deeply impressed by the universal sorrow expressed by the people and by the great outpouring of his constituents who desired to generously give evidence of the loss they so keenly felt. These incidents profoundly impressed me, and I mention them here that they may go into the RECORD as showing that the people with whom Mr. SKILES lived and moved, those who knew him long and knew him best, loved him most.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this time to speak of the life and character of the late Senator from Ohio, who lived to thrust aside the shafts of malice and ridicule that were aimed at him as they have been at no other man in public life for many years. I shall leave that work to those who were more closely associated with him and who knew him better than I.

Mr. Speaker, I arise to say a few words in memory of one with whom I had no personal acquaintance when I became a Member of this body, but one whom I soon learned to love. Long before I met him an old schoolmate of his had said to me: "I want you to meet Mr. SKILES. I know you will become friends." And the moment we met I felt that the prophecy was true. He had a genial nature, that seemed to lift the common things of everyday life into the light.

The windows of his soul were ever open to let in the joys and hopes that crowd along life's pathway. And yet he was not dead to life's sufferings and sorrows; they always touched his heart and were sure to elicit his sympathy, his comfort, and his aid.

In short, I found him to be just what his friend said he was—a true, honest, manly man. The work of his hand and his brain as shown forth in his character give true answer to the question often asked, "Is life worth living?" He knew that life is a precious jewel intrusted to our keeping to be polished and perfected and then worthily worn in the sight of all men.

No one could have stood with your committee in the city of Shelby on the 13th day of last January and looked into the grief-stricken faces of her people and longer doubted that it was worth while that such a life should have been lived.

Every word, every look, and every act of her citizens showed that one and all had sustained a personal loss in the death of WILLIAM SKILES.

Shelby had known him as man and boy for fifty years—farmer, teacher, lawyer, Representative in Congress; progressive, public-spirited citizen, and man of worth.

This was the story we heard whispered from every lip, while the grief pictured in every face told of the immeasurable loss that his death had brought to his friends and neighbors.

In the half a century that marked the span of his life Shelby had grown to be a city. His life had been interwoven with every step of her progress.

He had been one of the foremost contributors to her advancement, and as a universal token of respect the factory, the shop, the store, and the schools were closed, and her people with one accord turned aside to give expression to their grief and lovingly testify to the memory of his worth as a citizen and a man.

With bowed heads we gathered within the portals of his late home. Loving hands had covered the bier with sweet-scented flowers. It seemed that his work and his worth had been such that all nature had been robbed of her storehouse of flowers for his bed as if to conceal the fact that he was gone, that we might believe he was still one of us fallen asleep amid some bank of flowers, ready to wake again at a moment's notice to take up life's battles. The illusion seemed complete until we heard the voices of the singers raising an appeal for the departed soul.

Lead, kindly light, amid th' encircling gloom,
Lead thou me on!
The night is dark, and I am far from home:
Lead thou me on:
Keep thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene: one step's enough for me.

We listened and were touched by the appeal of the singers, and joined with them in a fervent prayer that the soul of our friend might even then be resting on the bosom of its Maker.

I know of no fitter tribute with which to close my remarks than these words, published at the time of his death, in the Shelby Globe.

Drop a tear. This day has marked a parting of the ways for us and one we held most dear. His life having been spent within her precincts, all Richland County to-day mourns the passing of W. W. SKILES.

Even as these lines are read the cortege is moving on the street, and the massive casket covered over with beautiful flowers is emblematic of the universal respect which enshrouds his memory with the living. He is dead. But his name will live in a loving people's heart till they, too, have joined the caravan.

We hear the muffled tread of horse and wheel as he is borne away, and our hearts swell with emotion for the loneliness of the home that death has touched; and yet it can not be undone. The wheels of time can not be reversed. And as tender hands place him in his last repose we breathe a sigh of "Peace to his ashes," and, returning from our mission, see the setting sun as it guides his soul to its distant home.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask that my remarks might be printed rather than that I should make any, but by so doing I would feel that I was unfaithful to a duty that I owed to one of the most pleasant friendships that I have ever formed in my life and one that I shall cherish so long as I shall live; and so, Mr. Speaker, after I have spoken of that friendship for a moment or two, I shall ask to continue my remarks in the RECORD.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. SKILES began when we came to Congress. At the meeting of the Fifty-seventh Congress both of us came as new Members of the Ohio delegation. I had known him by reputation, but from the very first time we met until he left for his home during his last sickness that friendship so pleasantly begun rapidly grew into close personal relations.

The days had not come to our friend SKILES when he could say in his heart that there was no pleasure in them. Scarcely had he begun that which was most promising for him and hardly had he entered upon that work which certainly not only bid fair, but assuredly promised, that there would come to him the just rewards for the kind and character of services that he bestowed upon that which he undertook. The mandate went out from on high, directing the messenger to summons WILLIAM W. SKILES from his busy, useful, active life to one of eternal rest. He has been gathered to his fathers, but is with us still, for the example of a good life can never be forgotten. Genuine praise that comes to one either living or dead is that which comes from his own home people. The regard in which one is held at home is the true measure of his real worth.

I never witnessed more genuine grief nor more universal regret over the death of any man than that manifested in his home city. Business was suspended, schools were closed, and the people went mourning about the streets. This to my mind is fully accounted for and was his just merit. He had been a loving husband, a kind, indulgent father, a successful lawyer, and had always been active in every proposition that involved the welfare of his home city. In this behalf his hand was not only seen, but the effect of his splendid business judgment was manifest.

Under his watchful eye Shelby grew from a village to an active, splendid manufacturing city, and it was to his pride that he had contributed to its material success, and there came to him for this solicitude and thoughtfulness the preference of its citizens for him. No man probably ever enjoyed in a larger degree and to a fuller extent the confidence of his people than did our departed friend; and when the opportunity offered itself to them to select a Member of Congress, they turned in but one direction and with but a single thought to their favored son, WILLIAM W. SKILES.

He served them faithfully and well, and through him came not only to his family and to his personal friends, but to the citizens of his community, the realization that his work was well done and the just pride that they and their welfare were ever uppermost in his mind, and that if the summons sent out for him must be answered no greater pleasure could come to him than that his life should be laid down while working for those who were nearest and dearest to him.

Mr. CASSINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, my first acquaintance with WILLIAM WOODBURN SKILES dated back to the period of his election to the Fifty-seventh Congress, and the impressions I gained at that time concerning his character continued until the day of his death.

He was a man of warm and genial nature, a true friend of those who once won his esteem, and of unbounded charity to all.

As a young man he worked his way through college by teaching every other term, and at the same time studying so that he might keep up with his class. After finishing his college course he entered upon the study of law, and to that profession he devoted himself until he was taken away, the only public office he ever held, with the exception of his service of eighteen years as a member of the school board, being in this body, commencing with the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Work and thoroughness in work was the guiding principle of his life, and the youth of this country can well look to his career as one to be emulated in the untiring devotion to one's chosen profession.

Yet this devotion to his extensive practice did not make him narrow-minded, for he became identified with many large enterprises and was charitable to the extreme, always ready to support any worthy cause. He gave liberally to all the churches in his home, although adhering to no particular creed. His faith in mankind and the ultimate good in all things was ever manifest. He was a man of firm and strong convictions and feelings, and yet there was no spirit of petty revenge or retaliation in his nature. "Leave it to time, for time levels all things," he was accustomed to say when anyone would talk to him of retaliation.

The beautiful side of his character is disclosed by what he considered as one of the proudest moments in his life—the visit of his aged mother to him after he took his seat in this body. The pride of the mother in seeing her son as one of the representatives of the people in Congress was to that son praise higher and sweeter than the commendation of the world. And he was a representative type of American citizenship in his affection for his family, probity in public and private life, and untiring zeal and capacity for work in his undertakings, and we on this side of the Chamber, who differed from him politically, admired him for his manly qualities and esteemed him for his kindly nature. In politics he always tried to avoid a conflict; but if the conflict came, he always had the courage to follow his convictions to the end.

Success in his own life made him the more partial to contribute, by words and deeds, in helping those just entering upon the struggles of life. In fact, he would not hesitate to assist in every way a young man whom perhaps he had never seen before. I could relate many instances of his unfailing kindness, but many of my colleagues also wish to pay tribute to his memory, and I know of no better way of closing my remarks upon the life and character of WILLIAM WOODBURN SKILES than by quoting the words of his favorite poem—

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift-fleeting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
Man passeth from life to his rest in the grave.
* * * * *
For we are the same our fathers have been;
We see the same sights our fathers have seen,
We drink the same stream and have the same sun,
And run the same course our fathers have run.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, to the luxuriance of beautiful tributes paid our dead colleague to-day I desire to add only a few words. It was a pleasure to serve with him on the Patents Committee, of which he was chairman, although my acquaintance with him was not a long one. He impressed me when I first met him as being a dignified, kind-hearted, able, elegant gentleman. My subsequent association with him confirmed this impression, and our intercourse was of the pleasantest nature. When the news of his death came I was grieved and shocked, and felt genuinely as did Byron when he wrote:

Thy day without a cloud hath pass'd,
And thou wert lovely to the last;
Extinguish'd, not decayed.

The best index of a man's character is the estimation in which he is held by those who knew him longest and best. Judged by this standard, W. W. SKILES must have approached unto the perfect man. He lived in Richland County and its capital city, Shelby, from his fifth year to his death—a period of a half century. When the Congressional funeral party reached Shelby grief could be discerned on every countenance, and sadness pervaded the entire atmosphere. The stores and shops were closed, business suspended, men and women spoke in whispers, and everything in the little city presented an air of bereavement. I do not think that I ever witnessed such a striking expression of universal grief. The weather was bitter cold, the mercury ranged below zero, the snow 12 inches deep and scattering flakes still falling; and yet women, men, and children stood for two hours in this freezing climate in order to get a last look at their departed friend and fellow-citizen. I shall never forget the sadly beautiful scene, as he lay in the parlor of his own cultured home, buried in a bank of fragrant flowers. He seemed as natural as in life, peaceful and serene in death as he had been imperturbable and equable while living.

All along the funeral march to the cemetery it appeared as if the entire population of the city had assembled to bow their heads in an expression of the keen sense of their loss, and many tear-stained eyes unmistakably betrayed the grief which had seized each heart. Yes, sir; he was well beloved by his own people—those who knew him best and longest—and this, at last, is the highest tribute that men can render unto man; that is, to love him.

In the loss of our colleague I am reminded of James Montgomery's words:

Friend after friend departs:
Who hath not lost a friend?
There is no union here of hearts
That finds not here an end.
Were this frail world our only rest,
Living or dying, none were blest.

To those faithful, loving ones who, of all others, loved him most, and to his great State, which honored him and which he honored, and in whose bosom he now sleeps, I commend the comforting lines written by the sweet singer Whittier:

I long for household voices gone;
For vanished smiles I long;
But God hath led my dear ones on,
And He can do no wrong.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Speaker, one of the first men with whom I became acquainted when I took my seat as a new Member of the Fifty-seventh Congress was Mr. SKILES, himself a new Member.

We were both appointed as members of the Committee on Patents, and I came to know him well. Modest and unassuming, his manner to all was that of a kind and courteous gentleman.

His was a most attractive and winning personality. His acquaintances speedily became his loving friends, and perhaps the first and best test of success in this world is the ability to win and hold personal friends.

We who served with him on the Committee on Patents soon discovered that he brought to the discharge of his duties a sound judgment, a high sense of honor, great industry in investigating all matters brought to the attention of the committee, and a conscientious desire to give the very best that was in him to the service of the country. He quickly grasped the main points of a proposition, and his suggestions regarding legislation were wise and helpful to his associates.

He was greatly attached to his home and to the town of Shelby, where he had long lived. There is something wrong about a man who does not love his home, who does not think that his home town is the fairest and best town in all the world and that his neighbors are the very best neighbors that a man ever had. In everything that made for the welfare and improvement and building up of Shelby Mr. SKILES was a leader, and no town ever had a more devoted and loyal citizen.

We who attended the last sad services at Shelby, and saw the great mills and all the business houses closed and silent while the people thronged the streets and stood with bared heads that cold and stormy day as the funeral procession passed, realized how much he was loved and how deeply he was mourned by those who knew him best.

Mr. SKILES was very proud of the privilege of representing the people of his district in the House and had a high sense of the honor and dignity of the position.

Of the nine Republicans who were members of the Committee on Patents in the Fifty-seventh Congress, Mr. SKILES and myself were the only ones reelected to the Fifty-eighth Congress, and at the beginning of this session we were again placed on that committee, Mr. SKILES being chairman. He took up the work of the committee with all the interest and earnestness and capacity for intelligent and well-directed labor which characterized his work everywhere. I looked forward with great pleasure to being associated with him in the business of the committee during the Fifty-eighth Congress.

We parted at the beginning of the holiday recess, expecting to meet again in a few days. When I returned I received a message from him announcing his illness and requesting me to take charge of the committee during a hearing which had been arranged before the recess. I wrote him that I would attend to it, but no final action would be taken by the committee until he returned, which we all hoped and believed would be in a few days. He dictated a reply, but before I received it he had passed away. His brief illness closed a life which in every way was a success, made so by ceaseless effort and strict integrity.

His life here, while it added to the work of a tired man, was, on the whole, I feel sure, a pleasant experience for him. The work of a Member of Congress in the House, in committees, and at the Departments, the thousand and one things to which he must give attention keep him occupied early and late; and were it not for the charming social intercourse which prevails among the Members and for the friendships we form here this life would not be worth living.

When a new Member takes his seat here he soon perceives that Congress is full of able men, and men not merely able, but brave and honest and conscientious. Men who with all the light they can get from a careful and patient investigation of pending measures are trying unselfishly to do their full duty.

No man for any great length of time can deceive a constituency of 200,000 intelligent people, and few men serve long in American politics unless their reputation for integrity and veracity is beyond question. The action of Congress is often bitterly criticised, sometimes when the criticism is deserved, but far more often when it is not deserved.

Mistakes are made here of course. The late William Walter Phelps once said: "Men who do not make mistakes never make anything else." The House is doing things, and often on a scale so vast as to be almost appalling to a man who comes here after an experience in the legislature of a small State, and on the whole all must admit that it does its work well.

In the death of Mr. SKILES the House lost a Member who in his brief career here demonstrated that he possessed those qualities which fit a man for able and successful public service, and the many Members of the House who were privileged to know him lost a dear and valued friend.

May we all hold as he did the respect, confidence, and love of our associates here and elsewhere "until the shadows lengthen, and the evening comes, and the busy world is hushed, and the fever of life is over, and our work is done."

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have not spoken may have leave to print remarks in the RECORD, and that all who have spoken may have leave to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now, in pursuance of the resolutions already adopted, and as a further mark of respect to the deceased Senator and Representatives, the House stands adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. LODGE. I present a communication from the Secretary of War, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, transmitting a compilation prepared in the Bureau of Insular Affairs relative to the administration of affairs by the civil government of those islands. I move that the communication and accompanying paper be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14944) establishing a regular term of the United States circuit and district courts at Lewisburg, W. Va., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. McCOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4197) to provide for the distribution of the Federal cases in the United States courts, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4569) for the relief of certain Indians by appeal from the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes to the United States courts, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 14) providing for the transfer of certain military rolls and records from the Interior and other Departments to the War Department, reported adversely thereon; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

PRESERVATION OF HISTORIC AND PREHISTORIC RUINS, ETC.

Mr. FULTON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5603) for the preservation of historic and prehistoric ruins, monuments, archæological objects, and other antiquities, and to prevent their counterfeiting, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, no one knows what the bill is, owing to the confusion in the Chamber. From what committee did it come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TELLER. It was reported this morning, I understand.

Mr. FULTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to object to its consideration, and to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the Calendar.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to explain in just a few words what the character of the bill is, and then I think the Senator from Colorado will not object to it.

Mr. TELLER. I can tell very much better what it is when I read it.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to make the explanation anyway.

Mr. TELLER. I know that some of these ruins are not on public land, and the Government has no control of those.

Mr. FULTON. No; and the bill does not pretend to give Government control over them. It could not if it desired.

Mr. TELLER. There is no indication that the attempt will not be made.

Mr. FULTON. We are not trying to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has gone to the Calendar under the objection.

Mr. FULTON. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It was considered by the Committee on Public Lands and referred to a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the Senator from California [Mr. BARD], and myself. All it proposes to do is to provide for the preservation of the prehistoric ruins and monuments found principally in the southwestern part of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if it does not suggest more reservations, and if pretty much everything in our country is not to be reserved?

Mr. FULTON. It makes no reservations except such portions as contain these ruins.

Mr. TELLER. The bill has gone to the Calendar, has it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has gone to the Calendar.

Mr. FULTON. It has gone to the Calendar, I understand, but I promised to make an explanation and, with the permission of the Chair, I should like to make it.

There are a great many people interested in this measure all over the country. All the scientific societies have taken an interest in it. They have been trying for years to secure legislation of this character. It seems to me very fitting and proper that some such legislation should be had.

I feel that I have done my duty when I have reported the bill and tried to secure its immediate consideration. I understand that going to the Calendar kills it for the present session and makes it impossible for it to become a law at this time.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUBURN, ME.

Mr. QUARLES. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1320) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Auburn, in the State of Maine, to report it favorably with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of the bill. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment of the committee was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "apparatus," to strike out the word "elevators;" and in line 11, after the word "apparatus," to strike out the word "elevators;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Auburn and State of Maine, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That no money shall be used for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Maine shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. PETTUS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14533) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, to report it favorably without amendment. It is a bill to change the holding of the United States court in Knoxville from one week to another week. It is only a few lines long, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICE OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1953) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the committee was to add at the end of section 4 the following proviso:

Provided, That one of said judges shall reside and hold a district court in the city of Roswell.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HARRY C. MIX.

Mr. BACON. I report back from the Committee on the Judiciary with a favorable recommendation and without amendment the bill (H. R. 875) for the relief of Harry C. Mix, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It relieves Harry C. Mix, of Bibb County, Ga., from any and all liability to pay a certain recognizance given by A. F. Holt and the said Harry C. Mix as security for A. F. Holt on the 23d day of January, 1895, in the penal sum of $1,500, by which recognizance they acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound to the United States of America that A. F. Holt should personally appear at the then next term of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Georgia, to be held at Savannah, Ga., in that district, on the first Monday in January, 1895, and at the succeeding term or terms, should the case be continued, A. F. Holt being charged with the embezzlement of postal funds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such an act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

W. B. ALLISON,
J. H. GALLINGER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. T. MCCLEARY,
E. J. BURKETT,
RICE A. PIERCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state with reference to this report that it settles all differences between the two Houses except the differences arising from amendments numbered 50 and 174, the first amendment relating to the municipal building and the second relating to the purchase of land for a new police-court building. All the other matters in difference between the two Houses have been agreed to by the conferees, and I now ask the Senate to agree to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments in disagreement and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives.

I will state to the Senate that the conferees on the part of the Senate regard these amendments as very important, and I hope if there is any disagreement with the views of the conferees, Senators will express their disagreement.

Mr. GORMAN. It has been utterly impossible to hear what is going on. I ask the Senator from Iowa what there is still in disagreement on the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. There is practically no disagreement except upon the provision relating to the municipal building, and in connection with that the amendments for the purchase of land with a view to the erection of a new police court. Those two are the principal amendments. There are one or two minor amendments that can be easily agreed to when those are disposed of. The municipal-building amendment is the important matter in difference.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, it is a very important matter. I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that the principal disagreement between the two Houses is in regard to the provision for the District building. As I understand the case, Congress provided for the construction of this building to accommodate all the District offices except the police court, and that now there comes on this bill an entirely new provision changing the law and providing that the police court shall be in the municipal building. I think that is a correct statement. Is it not?

Mr. ALLISON. The House provision requires the police court, the recorder of deeds, and the register of wills to be placed in the new building, and also requires that what is known as a "carpenter and repair shop" shall be placed in the basement of the building. It is stated by the architect of the building that to make the changes as proposed in the House provision will cost in round numbers some $350,000. The Senate passed upon these questions by declining to put the police court in this building, by declining to change the location of the recorder of deeds and the register of wills, and believes that the carpenter and repair shop would be out of place and impossible in the basement of the municipal building.

Mr. GORMAN. The provision which came from the House is, I understand, a change in the law; that is to say, when the building was provided for it did not contemplate and embrace room for the police court. Therefore the provision in the bill as it came to the Senate is a change in the law. If that be true, in view of the fact that it would mar the whole structure and bring to the municipal building of the District a class of persons arrested for petty crimes and make it one of the most disagreeable features in the District of Columbia, I understand the attitude of the Senate is that they can not submit to a proposition so objectionable. I understand further that always in matters of this sort when differences are to be adjusted between the two Houses, the House seeking to change the existing law or to put in a provision that had not theretofore been considered must recede.

If that be so, in view of all the circumstances and the desire of everybody in the city who has thought of the matter, I trust the Senate will not consent to recede from its amendment. If the case were reversed and the Senate had put upon the bill such a provision and the other House had objected to it, I think it would be the duty of the Senate to recede. That is the only way by which we can come to a conclusion in matters of this sort. There is every reason why the Senate should adhere to its amendment, and I trust the conferees will never consent, in the closing hours of the session, that such a provision shall be forced upon the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Just one word, Mr. President. The House does not concede that by the law which authorized the construction of this building there was such a detailed statement as would prevent Congress from now making provision for these offices. But aside from that the change proposed, the modifications to be made, will postpone this construction, will require an entirely new set of plans, and will largely increase the cost of the building, besides having the effect to place in the building offices and places that ought not to be there at all, as, with the exception of the police court, they are well provided for and are in close proximity to the courts which constantly must refer to and deal with the records of the District.

I have therefore moved that the Senate insist upon its amendments in disagreement and request a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. COCKRELL the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12220) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 15, 24, and 38.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 19, 20, 21, 31, 32, and 33, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "storehouse and storekeeper's office, to complete, fifty thousand dollars; in all, navy-yard, Charleston, S. C., seven hundred and six thousand five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "seven million two hundred and eighty-four thousand and seventy-one dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 14 of the amendment strike out all after the word "President" down to and including the word "action," in line 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "who, upon approval of such report, shall authorize the purchase of such site and the establishment of such naval training station;" and the Senate agree to the same.

EUGENE HALE,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
ALSTON G. DAYTON,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE. This is a complete agreement and disposes of the naval appropriation bill. The last item in the report which has just been read, referring to a training station for the Navy upon the Great Lakes, was finally agreed to with an amendment leaving the whole matter, after the board provided by the Senate amendment shall have reported, to the President, who may then establish the station, so that it is not brought back for more contests in the two Houses or in either of the two Houses. The amendment which the Senate put on, which has been adopted with the modification I have stated, indicates that the new board to be appointed would be not naval officers, but civilians, though that word is not used, living outside of any of the States that are interested in securing the site.

But it was not thought best to entirely restrict it, and the Secretary or the President can appoint a board consisting of a civilian, an engineer officer, and a naval officer; and I presume that that is what will be done, rather than to appoint three civilians. But all that is left in the discretion of the Secretary or the President.

Another matter had passed beyond the jurisdiction of the conferees——

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator passes from that amendment, I should like to learn a little bit more about the agreement having been reached as to the naval training station. The point to which I will address my inquiry is whether or not there was any limitation as to the territory within which the station should be selected.

Mr. HALE. There is no limitation.

Mr. FORAKER. Then they can go upon any of the Great Lakes. They are not restricted to Lake Michigan?

Mr. HALE. No; all that is left to the board.

Mr. FORAKER. They can take Put in Bay if they want to? I should like to have the provision read.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator if the action of this commission is final or whether they will report to Congress, as in the previous legislation.

Mr. HALE. They do not report, as I said, to Congress for controversy here, but report to the President, who may then establish a station.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then the action of the board will be final.

Mr. HALE. The action of the board, when approved by the President, will be final.

Mr. FORAKER. The action of the board is to be subject to the approval of the President, and not to the approval of Congress?

Mr. HALE. It is subject to the approval of the President. Undoubtedly the commission will be composed partly of civilians, but instead of being brought here for another controversy it is left to the President. Congress is not a very good place, as the Senator knows, to settle sites. I will state that this provision received the assent of the Senators from both sides of this question and from the House Members. It is left to the President to approve finally the report.

Mr. FORAKER. Can it be read?

Mr. HALE. It has been read.

Mr. FORAKER. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. It is in the RECORD.

There is another matter, I was going to say, that had passed from the jurisdiction of the conferees because it was agreed to by both Houses—that a battle ship should be comprehended in the naval programme of the naval appropriation bill. Under the light of events that have transpired in the East and the very remarkable developments that have in naval warfare been disclosed, if that matter had been open I should certainly have been in favor either of striking out the provision for the battle ship or providing that no step should be taken toward committing ourselves to it until the next session of Congress. But as it has been agreed to by both Houses, we could not interfere with that matter.

I may say that if I was Secretary of the Navy, in the present conditions I should not dare to go on and commit the Government to the building of another immense battle ship costing $8,000,000. The lessons of the war between Russia and Japan thus far go to show the vulnerability, the unsafety, of these immense, lofty battle ships and the undesirability at present of committing ourselves to the further construction of them. The salient events of the war show how incomplete as an engine of war one of these enormous, high-turreted battle ships is. If she is struck below the water line and the center of gravity is disturbed, she turns over like a turtle and everybody on board her is drowned.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the language of the bill permissive or mandatory?

Mr. HALE. It is permissive, undoubtedly. It authorizes.

Mr. SPOONER. So it is practically in the discretion of the Department or the President?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. He can withhold action.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly the President and the Secretary can withhold action.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Maine will pardon me, I desire to recall his attention to the fact that when this bill was under consideration I ventured to suggest that the improvements in submarine offensive weapons and engines were such that it would probably be a comparatively short time before a battle ship, however well it might be protected against the ordinary projectile, would be out of date and obsolete if it were not provided with protection against the submarine boat and the submarine torpedo.

Mr. HALE. The Senator was wise in his suggestion, but events since then have marched with such startling rapidity that the point made by the Senator becomes more apparent and more important than it then was.

The trouble with the great, the immense, the elaborate, the lofty battle ship, which, as Senators have seen, does not look like a ship, but like a great fortification, is that when she is hurt she can fight no longer. Other structures may be hurt, may be splintered, may be damaged, but they keep fighting on. But if an explosion takes place from hurried firing in a turret, it is more than likely to communicate to the magazine, and the whole ship, with everybody on board, is blown into the air. Aside from the occurrences in the East, where Russian battle ships, one after the other, have been disabled and put out of service, we have had three important calamitous accidents on our battle ships within the last year—the Iowa, the Massachusetts, and later the Missouri. It was only the breadth of a hand that prevented the entire battle ship Missouri, the latest of our battle ships and the best upon that design, being entirely destroyed. If the magazine had been communicated with by the fire, or the explosion, the whole ship would have gone. Just such an accident as that is likely to occur in any turret at any time during any battle.

Mr. STEWART. May I interrupt the Senator from Maine to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not discretionary, under the language of this report from the committee of conference, as to whether or not the Secretary shall take this action?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. The provision is that for the increase of the Navy the President is authorized, etc., and then it goes on to describe what shall be done.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a single remark. I hope we shall not build it. I have suggested several times that I believed that these battle ships, so far as warfare is concerned, would soon be found to be an engine of the past. I do not believe they are up to date. They may be good for a battle at sea, but they will be superseded by submarine boats and other submarine devices to be employed near the land. I repeat, they will be of no use, except for a battle at sea, if such a battle shall ever occur. For battles about harbors I do not think they are going to be used.

I believe the old monitors and ships of that style for the defense of ports were better than these expensive battle ships. I am very glad the Department is under no necessity to construct such ships under the report that is made. I hope, before we undertake any such thing, we shall examine very carefully the progress of recent inventions for the defense of harbors—submarine boats and other inventions—which are being made daily for such defense. All those should be thoroughly examined before we expend these vast sums on a thing which, to my mind, is purely experimental.

Mr. HALE. Of course this is largely in the realm of conjecture. Nobody can prophesy with any authority; but with the lessons that have already been learned, I should doubt whether at the termination—whenever that may be—of the Eastern war between Russia and Japan any nation will go on building more of these enormous, high-turreted battle ships, and there is danger of this war showing to us that we have got a bad investment in the $150,000,000 that we have already put into the battle ships.

I do not find undue fault with the Department or with the boards that have recommended these things, for other nations have been going on in a quite reckless way in building these enormous, high-turreted ships. It will be a melancholy thing if it is found that the great investment in these ships has proved of comparatively little value in case of naval warfare.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire if it is a rule of our Department now that in battle ships the secondary batteries shall be superimposed on the main battery turret? Some vessels of the class, I think, of the Kearsarge have what are called "superimposed turrets," with smaller guns, 8-inch guns, superimposed on the 12-inch guns; but that makes them rather lofty, and I should like to inquire if that is a rule to be adhered to hereafter in the construction of our battle ships?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in some remarks which I submitted when this bill was under consideration in the Senate I stated the history of the double superimposed turrets. It shows the fallacy of trusting entirely to a board of officers. There ought to be a larger introduction of the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy in these matters, rather than that of the board. The Kearsarge and Kentucky were built not only with the lofty turrets which other turreted vessels have, but with the additional turret for small guns on top, making them still more top-heavy and more liable, to use the phrase which they have now adopted in the Navy, of "turning turtle," than if they had but one revolving turret. At that time the board declared that that was the typical vessel which ought to be built for the future.

But the board changed its mind the next year, and we have had, most fortunately in my judgment, no more ships built, and none are contemplated of this still greater height than the ordinary turret—the upper revolving turret for small guns. But it shows the fallacy of depending upon the reports of boards when the Secretary of the Navy has not had enough to do with it and Congress has not had enough to do with it.

Congress ought to have some part in the legislation upon this matter; but the whole subject is now left with the Secretary of the Navy. I hope the Secretary will exercise large and administrative caution, prudence, and restraint before any more money is spent upon another of these great battle ships. I hope he will himself exercise that prudence and that discretion. He is the representative of the Government in the Department, and in large questions he should decide; and he, better than any board of mere naval officers, who want to keep pushing the building of these large vessels, can decide whether it is wise to go on and to commit the Government to the erection of another one of these unsafe vessels.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask him a question which grows out of what he says?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. McCOMAS. The Senator speaks of the danger to battle ships and the effect of submarine torpedoes. Is not the same difficulty apt to occur with respect to heavily armored cruisers?

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President, it is not. The Senator has seen the two classes of ships and knows the difference between them. The center of gravity of the armored cruiser is not so likely to be disturbed by a shot or an accident or an explosion as is that of the battle ship. I think it likely that we may have gone to the extent of building the cruisers too large; but I think that in the future the formidable fleet will be the smaller vessels with the smaller guns. Pretty much all the damage that has been inflicted in naval warfare has been under this late management and development of the fleets by the 8-inch guns.

I do not pretend to be an expert, but from long study and contemplation I have certain views about these things, and I should not put a gun larger than a 10-inch gun in any ship. I should think twice—yes, three times—before building the great, high-turreted battle ships that a single shot or a single accident will put out of service.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor.

Mr. MALLORY. Before the Senator from Maine takes his seat I should like to ask him a question for information as to the action of the conferees in regard to the Charleston Navy-Yard.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield.

Mr. HALE. That is left as the House left it on the motion of the Representative from the Charleston district in that body, with the addition of an appropriation for one more building. The House put on the bill, against the report of the Naval Committee of that body, items amounting to about $600,000—all that was asked. The committee have only added to that a provision for one building.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I notice by the provisions of this bill that the discretion as respects the battle ships is in the President of the United States. That discretion, as I understand this provision, will require him to build a 16,000-ton battle ship or else postpone the construction of any battle ship under this bill. I want to ask the Senator from Maine how many of these 16,000-ton battle ships we have now?

Mr. HALE. None of them as yet have been launched, but three were provided for under the act of last year, and one this year, and previously there were three or four, perhaps five, almost as large, but they do not come up to 16,000 tons. The limitation as to size has resulted from the language which rather unguardedly—and I take to myself some reproach about that—has been used, that they should be of about such a tonnage. So when we would provide for a ship of about 11,000 tons, the naval board would recommend a ship of 13,000 tons, and we would go on and build it.

Last year, taking notice of this, I had inserted a provision which ought to have been put in bills before, that such vessels should be of not more than a certain tonnage, so that the Secretary of the Navy has discretion. I say "the Secretary of the Navy," but it is all left to the President in terms, because that is our way of legislating. Practically, however, it is in charge of the Secretary of the Navy, although the President, being a higher officer, is intrusted in terms with this discretion. So the Secretary can build under this provision any battle ship up to 16,000 tons, or he can defer taking any steps until after developments in the Eastern war, for the President is only authorized to do this.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, as I understand, there are but few battle ships of this size now in existence.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I trust we shall have order in the Senate Chamber. We on this side should like to hear what Senators on the other side are saying. I should like to be able to do so, at all events.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not know whether a battle ship of this size has ever been constructed.

Mr. HALE. There is not a 16,000-ton battle ship to-day afloat on any of the seas of the globe.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand.

Mr. HALE. But there are several being built, and there is one that comes pretty near to that tonnage; but there is not to-day, I repeat, nor has there been tried in any way, nor tested at all, a single battle ship afloat of 16,000 tons.

Mr. ALLISON. The discretion given to the President in this bill, I have no doubt, will be wisely exercised. In view of the fact that battle ships on the ocean are now being tested in a pretty lively way, I should think that it would do no harm to postpone the preparation for the building of this battle ship until Congress can again convene and deal with this subject in the light of the situation at that time.

Mr. HALE. That is exactly what I hope the Secretary of the Navy or the President will do.

Mr. GORMAN. I understood the Senator from Maine—there was so much confusion in the Chamber, however, that I could not hear everything he said—to say that, in view of recent experience growing out of the management of battle ships, as a result of the experience in the war being waged between Russia and Japan, if the conferees had had full charge of this matter and the right to deal with it, they probably would have left out this great battle ship of 16,000 tons.

Mr. HALE. I can not quite speak for the conferees, but I certainly should have urged that upon the committee of conference if the subject had been within their discretion.

Mr. GORMAN. I so understood the Senator. I understood, of course, the Senator to speak only for himself, but I wish to ask him whether it is even yet too late to bring up the question? The clause providing for the increase of the Navy, beginning on page 75 of the bill as it passed the Senate, placed in the President authority to have a battle ship constructed, of course under the Secretary of the Navy and under the supervision of a board, but it practically leaves with the President of the United States the primary and real responsibility in this matter.

I trust that the President will take note of what has been so well said, not only this morning, but on a previous occasion, by the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who, while not being an expert in naval architecture and construction, probably has had as large experience in these matters as any man in the service of the Government and who has done so much to build up the Navy.

What I sought to do when this bill was under consideration was to limit the appropriation, having in mind, as the Senator from Maine has in mind, the prediction of Mr. Ericsson, who built the first ironclad, that the time would speedily come when those great ironclads would become obsolete and when torpedo boats and submarine mines would supplant them.

But the officers of the Navy have been so restless about this matter and so determined not to have any restraint put upon them that I have felt during this very session that there was an unwise and impolitic encroachment on the part of the Secretary of the Navy himself, who, when the suggestion was made for a reduction of this amount so as to afford time to enable the Department to ascertain what was the best policy to pursue, has criticised Senators and Representatives who had been advocating that idea and published them all over the world as being opposed to a navy.

So, while I can understand perfectly the desire of the heads of the various bureaus in the Department and their position regarding those who oppose great appropriations, I repeat what I said on a former occasion when this bill was under consideration, that the appropriation is too great; that we are moving along too rapidly; but the power of the executive branch has been such during this session that we have not been able in any respect to curtail the appropriations on these accounts.

A hundred millions for the Navy! It must come back to the Executive as a matter of necessity to suspend the operation of this bill if the country is to be saved this enormous expenditure.

I take it that the statement of the Senator from Maine that the conference committee has no jurisdiction over this matter is probably well taken, although I have known cases where a bill has been amended as this has been, not in relation to the number and size of ships, but other provisions in some cases have been amended.

I had hoped that the conference committee would take the matter up, and not depend solely upon the exercise of a wise discretion in the executive branch. I have some hope that such discretion will be exercised in this particular case in the interest of the country; but that is not the proper way to legislate.

The Senator from Maine is quite right, that Congress ought to determine, after an examination by experts and a report by the Navy Department, as to the character, the number, and the cost of these ships; and all that ought to be definitely stated in the act. That is what we have been doing from the beginning of the construction of the new Navy until recently.

I trust the result of this discussion and the information we have gained in the management of war ships in the great contest being waged between the Russian and the Japanese nations will induce us at the next session to more carefully scrutinize these appropriations.

It is, I repeat, Mr. President, a most extraordinary thing that the country and the press of the country have taken no note of the tremendous speed at which we are proceeding in this matter of preparation for war.

The Senator speaks of the size of the guns. Sir, there has been a constant pressure from the experts of the War and the Navy Departments to make our guns greater and better than are produced by any other nation on the face of the earth. We have given them ample authority and all the money that has been required to do so. I remember well a contest was made for a year or two in both Houses of Congress over a proposition to enable the Army to construct a 16-inch gun. We made appropriations for it. There was no machinery in the United States equal to the requirements of its construction, and I believe there has been built but one such gun, which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. The Navy, rivaling the Army and endeavoring to reach out further, attempted practically the same thing, but they only reached, I believe, a 13-inch gun.

Now it has come to pass that the experience of naval officers all over the world has demonstrated that a 6 or an 8 inch gun is all that is required on one of these ships and that it is the most effective. So the time has come for a halt.

It is true, as I said a moment ago, notwithstanding the press and apparently the people—for, as a rule, we can only judge what their views are through the press—seem to take no note of these expenditures; but the time has come—and I am glad to see the Senator from Maine take that view—of bringing the matter back to a fair consideration by Congress, so that we may have economy and a more thorough system in all of these expenditures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the naval appropriation bill.

The report was agreed to.

BOIES PENROSE,
J. P. DOLLIVER,
A. S. CLAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JESSE OVERSTREET,
J. J. GARDNER,

I concur in this report except as to Nos. 42 and 43.

JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLAY. I suggest to the chairman of the committee—and I know that some other Senators on this side of the Chamber feel the same way about it—that this conference report be printed and taken up in the morning. I think it can be disposed of then in a few minutes. I hope that suggestion will be accepted.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator desires that, very well; but I should like to have the report agreed to to-day.

Mr. CLAY. After conference with some of the Senators on this side of the Chamber, I am sure we shall save time by postponing until to-morrow the consideration of the report.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed and lie over.

DAVID ROBERTSON.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3684) to place David Robertson, sergeant first class, Hospital Corps, on the retired list of the United States Army, to report it with an amendment, and to submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 8, after the word "Senate," to strike out:

Promote said David Robertson to be a second lieutenant of infantry in the Army of the United States, and to place him upon the unlimited retired list of the Army in that grade.

And to insert:

to place said David Robertson on the retired list of the United States Army with the full pay and allowances of the grade held by him at the date of such retirement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN WALLER.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 36) to reimburse John Waller, postmaster at Monticello, N. Y., for money expended in carrying the mail, to report it with an amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$800" and insert "$426.25;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Waller, late postmaster at Monticello, N. Y., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $426.25 to reimburse him for money expended in carrying the United States mails and from damages consequent therefrom.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH CROW.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2896) for the relief of Joseph Crow, to report it with an amendment, and to submit a report thereon.

Mr. MILLARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. MALLORY. What committee reported that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, in line 9, to strike out the words "as above stated" and insert "of post-office funds by Alfred M. Oleson;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $1,029.59 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and that the same be paid to Joseph Crow, of Omaha, county of Douglas, State of Nebraska, to reimburse him for a like amount charged against his account as postmaster by reason of the embezzlement of post-office funds by Alfred M. Oleson.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was rejected.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF IOWA.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14673) to create a new division of the southern judicial district of Iowa, and to provide for terms of court at Davenport, Iowa, and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS AT LEWISBURG, W. VA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14944) establishing a regular term of the United States circuit and district courts at Lewisburg, W. Va.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The morning business has not yet been concluded.

Mr. SCOTT. I wanted to call the bill up when it was reported, but I happened to be absent from the Chamber at the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, however, That suitable rooms and accommodations are furnished for holding said courts free of expense to the Government of the United States.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That a regular term of the United States circuit and district courts for the southern district of West Virginia shall be held every year at Lewisburg, W. Va., on the second Tuesday in February.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5504) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the counties of Sherburne and Wright, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River," approved March 29, 1904.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is not yet concluded. Will the Senator wait until the morning business shall have been concluded?

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

REVISION OF PENSION LAWS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], coming over under an objection.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. MCCUMBER on the 23d instant, as follows:

Whereas the pension laws of the United States have not since the origin of the pension system been revised; and

Whereas, owing to the fact of different wars and different acts of Congress which have been passed relative thereto, some of which clearly apply to one condition and others to other conditions, a confusion has arisen with respect to their interpretation; and

Whereas some of these acts are overlapping, some of them practically repealed, and some in part obsolete by implication; and

Whereas the interpretation of different Assistant Attorneys-General and Pension Commissioners has brought about a further conflict as to the legal effect of certain acts, and has made doubtful the full legal right of pension claimants; and

Whereas by reason of these conditions the pension laws of the United States are in a condition of uncertainty and should be revised and codified; and

Whereas the said laws are not in all respects adequate to meet the present conditions of the survivors of our wars:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to have prepared by officials of the Pension Bureau and to report to the Senate at its next meeting in December, 1904, a proposed revision of the pension laws of the United States, applicable to all of the military service of the United States, the same to contain full notes of statutes and decisions; and that there be arranged in separate titles so much of the law as is still applicable and has reference specially to each particular war for which a pension law has been passed.

That there be drafted in such code, separate and distinct from the substantive law relative to pensions, rule of procedure for pension claims, providing therein such blank forms as will enable a pension claimant to conduct his own case.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply wish to say in reference to this matter that a bill was introduced some time ago and referred to the Committee on Pensions for the appointment of a commission to revise the pension laws of the United States. That committee, after considering the matter, deemed it better to first consult with the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions to see if they could not with their present force do the work better than any commission. Therefore I called upon the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions and they informed me then, as they did also later by letter, that with the force which they have and with attorneys and those who are competent to take the matter into consideration they could during the recess of Congress prepare a proposed pension law and submit it to the Senate.

I believe we could get better results by this method of procedure than by a commission, and inasmuch as it is simply to report a proposed revision with all amplifications and notes necessary for Senators to fully understand it, I hope there will be no objection to allowing the Pension Commissioner and the Secretary of the Interior to prepare and report to us such a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will inquire whether this is a Senate or a concurrent resolution.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It is a Senate resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is simply a Senate resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think if anything is to be done in this matter it ought to be by concurrent action of the two Houses.

But, Mr. President, I wish to make a statement along a different line. Supposing that I was still occupying the honorable position of chairman of the Committee on Pensions, Judge Botkin, who is chairman of a commission appointed some years ago to revise the statutes of the United States, telephoned me this morning that that commission have had for a considerable time under consideration a proposed revision of the pension laws and have almost completed their work. He said to me that if it was necessary the revision his committee had made could be completed and reported to Congress in a single week, but that they would like a little longer time than that to complete their work.

Now, Mr. President, under those circumstances, inasmuch as this matter has had very careful consideration by three distinguished jurists, and their work is almost entirely completed, it seems to me it is not necessary for us to do anything further about it until we get the result of the work of that commission.

If the matter had not been taken up previously I think the scheme the Committee on Pensions has suggested here would be a very wise one, and that it might result in precisely what we have so long desired—a revision and codification of the pension laws. But under the existing conditions I think the Senator from North Dakota will agree with me that it is not wise for us to have a revision made by this distinguished commission and another revision made by law clerks in the Interior Department.

So I trust, Mr. President, that for the present, at least, the resolution may be allowed to go over.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to inquire why Congress shall impose upon itself the necessity of labor in connection with the pension laws? Why not just leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to issue an executive order and dispose of them hereafter like he has done heretofore?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, the necessity for a revision of the pension laws has long been felt, not only to every Senator who has made any study of the subject, but also to the Interior Department itself. There is, I believe, no commission that could so successfully deal with that subject as could the Department itself. The Department are ready, willing, and anxious to make this report for us at the next session. They are able to make it. They have all the data before them. They have every one of the conditions before them upon which there has been any disagreement between the Department and the legislators. They understand the matter thoroughly.

Every question that can possibly arise under the pension laws is daily before the Pension Bureau. It seems to me that, having before them constantly all of these defects, the Pension Bureau is better enabled to prepare and to present to us for intelligent discussion a proposed amendment or revision of the pension laws. Even though there may have been a commission working on general laws and taking up the pension laws in connection with them, I do not believe that that commission can give us the information that is called for in this resolution.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the resolution may pass, as we will have then the report directly from the Interior Department and from the Pension Bureau, which will enlighten us on every point on which we will want information at the coming session.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if it were purely and only a codification of the pension laws, even including pension orders and regulations——

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. Then it might be proper to request the Department having charge of it to make the compilation. But I understand the Senator to say that the legislation in certain respects is inadequate, and he seeks the advice of the Pension Department upon matters of legislation. Am I correct in that?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is not correct. That may be one position, but the acts overlap each other. Some of them are practically repealed simply by implication. Some of them are claimed to be obsolete; some of them are not. They are not all of them clearly expressed. Some of them relate to one war, and some to another. Take, for instance, the Indian wars. The acts are not all couched in the same language. They are not all subject to the same conditions. The preamble explains the reason for this work. The reason that is suggested by the Senator from Texas is only one out of the many reasons.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I believe those matters should properly come in a report from the Interior Department to Congress. But when Congress confesses its inability to reconcile conflicting laws, or the Department confesses its inability to state what law has been repealed and what is in force, it looks to me like we need legislation more than advice.

I am not willing to see Congress completely and entirely abdicate its right to legislate on these matters, and I am compelled to object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not see how the Senator can say the Department would be legislating when we ask the Department to give us information that we may legislate on the subject.

Mr. BAILEY. It is the Department's duty to give us that information in a report, and you ask——

Mr. McCUMBER. And we propose simply to call——

Mr. LODGE. I call for the regular order. Objection has been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is the regular order. Objection was made to it on Saturday.

Mr. GORMAN. I objected to it on Saturday.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that is exactly what we are doing in this resolution. We are calling for the information, but we are calling for it to be submitted to us in such a form, with such annotations, that we may clearly and distinctly understand it, so that it may be the better presented for our consideration. I certainly can see no objection to having the report made in this way, in the form of proposed legislation.

There is not a single committee that does not send down to the several Departments for information, and they ask the Department to propose a bill for legislation.

In two-thirds of the cases the bills which are passed by the Senate are such bills as are reported by the several Departments to the Senate. It gives us a better understanding of the matter, and certainly I can see no objection to its coming in this form.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit the last whereas to be read?

Mr. McCUMBER. I intend to strike out all of the preamble when the question is reached on agreeing to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. That relieves one of my objections to the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator also strike out the requirement that there shall be a proposed revision, and content himself with a compilation? Then I will have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have a compilation now that has been prepared, and I defy the Senator or anyone else to understand that compilation. As I said, several portions overlap each other and are almost incomprehensible.

Mr. BAILEY. Surely the Senator does not propose to intrust a revision to a Department that is incapable of making an intelligible compilation? If you have a compilation you can not understand, as matters exist, then what would be the state of the law when the same compilers were through with the revision?

Will the Senator permit me to ask what objection there is to the commission whose appointment and whose work now is almost completed, as has just been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire? I understand that commission was appointed under a law of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Several years ago.

Mr. BAILEY. Several years ago. They have doubtless been paid for their work and are now ready to hand it over completed to Congress. In the face of the fact that they hold the appointment in the usual and ordinary way of organizing a board of revision or codification, and in view of the fact that they are now within a week or ten days of a readiness to present their work to Congress, it seems to me unusual, if not extraordinary, that the whole matter should now be taken out of their hands and committed to some one else.

There must be some good reason for it. Of course the Senator does not propose a measure of this kind without a reason. It may be that he has examined the compilation soon to be submitted and that it is unsatisfactory, or it may be that those who have undertaken the work under the authority of Congress have not revised, but have simply compiled, the laws, and it may be that new laws are desired, rather than to know what the existing law is.

Of course the Senator from North Dakota might enlighten the Senate on that point. It might be that the Senate would take this whole matter out of the hands of those to whom it has been intrusted and commit it to new hands, which, in the nature of things, would require some time for its work.

I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, how long the commission to which he referred has been engaged in this work?

Mr. GALLINGER. I remember meeting Judge Botkin, of Montana, I think, who was at the head of the commission, at least three years ago. The commission was then engaged in its work of revising and codifying the laws of the United States. This morning Judge Botkin telephoned me that as part of their work they had taken up the pension laws and have given the matter very careful and patient consideration, and are about to conclude their work on that particular branch of the law, saying to me that if it was necessary they could report on that within a week or ten days, but that they would like to have a little more time.

Mr. BAILEY. Now I comprehend. That is the same commission that was authorized by a duly enacted law to codify all the laws of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely; all the laws.

Mr. BAILEY. And it is their duty in codifying those laws to omit the obsolete portions, those that have been repealed by subsequent enactments. That commission was originally composed of great lawyers, some of whom I had the honor to know. I understand that some of them now are entitled to the highest respect for their legal attainments. Surely it is better to leave it with them than to send it to the Department, whose compilation is admitted to be unintelligible.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is not simply a question of compilation. What we wish is a revision. I do not think that the Department would have any authority in a matter of compilation to leave out anything of the body of the law itself which would tend to make it clear and explain it. Even though portions of the law overlap each other, even though some portions were more or less inconsistent with each other, still they would all have to go in the compilation. In a matter of a revision of the laws we would change the substance of the laws themselves, we would arrange them in a form in which they would be intelligible, we would leave out the redundant matter, and would change it entirely to conform it to present conditions.

I confess I do not see that we are taking anything out of the hands of the commission of which the Senator speaks. If they make their report, well and good. But I would place more confidence in a report that was made not only by good lawyers but by those who have a full and complete knowledge of the subject-matter and of the infirmities that daily arise under the administration of the pension laws. We might have the very best of jurists to compile the laws or to determine what would be a fair system of pension laws, but in order to get what we wish, in order to avoid the inconsistencies, in order to secure greater justice and equality in the administration of the pension laws, I believe that many suggestions could be given us by the Department that could not be given us by a commission unless that commission got its information from the Department. In my talk with the Secretary of the Interior and with the Commissioner I have not ascertained that this commission has called upon them for any great amount of assistance or information.

Mr. President, we appointed some ten years ago, I think, a commission to revise the criminal code of the United States. That commission, I believe, made, some three or four years ago, one little report of what it was doing, and the revision has not shown up yet. I do not believe the commission that has been appointed will have for our use a report that we can use and use to the same advantage that we could the one which the resolution calls for.

They have their force there in the Department at work: they can give us this information, and if the Department are willing to furnish us that information, I can not see what possible objection any Senator could have to the Senate receiving it. The Committee on Pensions wish it; they ask for it; it is no expense to the Government to grant it, and if we need it in our deliberations and ask for it, I do not understand why any Senator should object to our receiving it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single word. I hesitate, of course, to put myself in opposition to the wishes of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and yet it does seem to me conclusive that inasmuch as this matter is in the hands of a very distinguished commission, composed of eminent jurists who have given the matter great consideration, it is safer there than in the hands of what is provided in this resolution—officials of the Pension Bureau. I apprehend there is not a lawyer of any considerable distinction in the Pension Bureau, unless it be the Commissioner himself.

Mr. McCUMBER. I beg to differ with the Senator on that point. I think there is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, if there are eminent lawyers working for from $1,200 to $2,000 a year, I think they might find better employment.

Mr. McCUMBER. One may become quite efficient, I will say to the Senator, where all his life work for ten or fifteen years has been in a single Department, so that he would understand at least the pension laws, though he might not understand real-estate laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says this will not be any expense to the Government. Of course it will. If officials of the Bureau are detailed to do this work, when they are doing that they will not be doing something else. The fact is that it will not be of any expense if we allow it to remain in the hands of the commission that now has it in charge. They are paid a salary, a large salary commensurate with their distinguished attainments. I really think that in the matter of correct and salutary legislation we ought at least to wait until this commission makes its report, which will be here before we assemble in December next.

I can not believe that we will get a result as favorable from a codification, or whatever it may be, made by clerks in the Bureau of Pensions as we will from eminent jurists who are now engaged in the work.

My attention was attracted by the last whereas, as well as by some of the preceding ones, and I confess that I do not see the great necessity for this work. We have got along pretty well. The Pension Bureau are granting pensions under existing laws, and I do not know that the soldiers are finding fault about it; they seem to be doing it very liberally. Congress is taking up the work of special pensions, and I do not apprehend that any codification or revision or the laws will help us in determining any of the cases that come here for our consideration.

Everything considered, Mr. President, it seems to me that the resolution can safely be laid over for the present and not be pressed for further action.

But, Mr. President, if the resolution is to pass I want it to be a concurrent resolution, and I now move to amend the resolution, so that it will read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring).

And also to amend it so as to provide that the report shall be made to Congress at its next meeting, in place of being made to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to make the resolution a concurrent resolution, and in line 3 to strike out the words "the Senate," and insert in lieu thereof the word "Congress."

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from New Hampshire was making an observation when I came into the Chamber that I did not distinctly understand. I should like to interrogate him, with his consent, in regard to it. If I correctly understand the Senator, he said that the commission which is revising the statutes of the United States has about completed a revision of the pension laws and will be shortly ready to report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator, as I stated in my previous remarks, that this morning, supposing that I still occupied the position of chairman of the Committee on Pensions, Judge Botkin, who is at the head of that commission, telephoned me, saying that the commission had had for some time under consideration the pension laws and had about completed their work and could make a completed report, if necessary, so far as their work was concerned, in a week.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota why we should have two revisions of the pension laws proceeding at the same time?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know why we should have two commissions appointed for considering the general laws and another one appointed for the consideration of the criminal code; yet such seems to have been the case. One thing is certain: This commission, I believe, were appointed some four or five years ago, and up to the present time they have reported nothing. The Committee on Pensions has had before it the matter of the revision of the entire pension code. We wish to take that up at the next session. The committee desires to get all the light it can on that subject. It ought not to be forced to secure all of the light that it may receive entirely from a revision by the commission who, as has been suggested, are working upon a revision of the entire laws of the United States.

We ask for many things in this resolution that would not be in their revision. For instance, we ask that it "contain full notes of statutes and decisions." We ask "that there be arranged in separate titles so much of the law as is still applicable and has reference specially to each particular war for which a pension law has been passed." We ask "that there be drafted in such code, separate and distinct from the substantive law relative to pensions, rule of procedure for pension claims, providing therein such blank forms as will enable a pension claimant to conduct his own case." In other words, we ask for considerable information that we would not obtain in the revision by this commission.

In order to take this matter up intelligently before the committee, as I said, the chairman of that committee called upon the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions and stated to those officers what was desired: that it was desired simply for the purpose of information and to get the idea of the Pension Bureau as to what the pension law ought to be, that the Department's ideas might guide, to some extent, our own judgment. This we could not get from the Commissioners, because they have nothing to do with carrying into effect the pension laws. They would necessarily not understand them as well or understand the many defects that are in those laws as the Department which has the enforcement of the laws.

Now, as the Pension Committee asked for this, I was directed to introduce the resolution. It was done for that purpose, so that we might secure this information. They can furnish it; they are willing to furnish it and desirous to do it. That being the case, not knowing exactly whether this matter will come before the next Congress or not, but being certain that the Bureau can furnish us something, we simply ask that they be allowed to furnish it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, is the Senator through?

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who says he has heard no complaint from the soldiers relative to the present pension laws or relative to their enforcement, that it is certainly a surprise to me. The great complaint that is made by the soldiers of the country is the red-tapism that they have to go through in order to secure a pension, and it is to simplify and codify the laws and procedure that we have brought this matter before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the resolution goes to the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I beg the indulgence of the Senate, having been absent on a conference——

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me that I may simply ask that the resolution, instead of going to the Calendar, may lie on the table and go over until to-morrow?

Mr. TELLER. I object to that. Let it go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution goes to the Calendar.

COURTS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 15228) establishing a regular term of the United States circuit and district courts at East St. Louis, Ill.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. It is a very short bill and local in its character.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out the proviso at the end of section 3, as follows:

Provided, however, That suitable rooms and accommodations are furnished for holding said courts free of expense to the Government of the United States until such time as a Federal building shall be erected in said city of East St. Louis.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Georgia kindly yield to me? I desire to ask——

Mr. BACON. I have not the floor. I can not yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5504) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the counties of Sherburne and Wright, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River," approved March 29, 1904. It is a Senate bridge bill, and I should like to have it go over to the House so that it may be passed there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Minnesota asked me to yield to him. I have not the floor.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Georgia gave notice that at 2 o'clock he would desire to address the Senate, and, according to the usual custom, he has a right to the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I was aware of that fact, and therefore I asked the Senator to yield to me.

Mr. BACON. I gave notice that I would ask the courtesy of the Senate to-day, but the time has expired, and I do not know whether the Senate desires that I shall proceed or not. I submit myself to the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Go right on.

Mr. TELLER. Go on.

Mr. BACON. I will state that three or four Senators have asked that I would yield to them, and if it will not take too much time I will do so with pleasure, especially as I myself am now in a condition to ask favors. I will state the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has given notice that at a certain hour he will call up resolutions from the House relative to the death of one of his colleagues in that body, and therefore my time is necessarily limited.

I have consented, however, that I would yield to certain Senators, and with the permission of the Senate I will yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. FOSTER], provided his bill does not consume time.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. It is a very short bill, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that I will yield to him, but I have made a promise to three Senators prior to his request, and I will yield to him in his order.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not make an objection, but I wish to suggest that I do not think it is regular for a Senator to get the floor for one purpose and then yield to Senators to pass bills. I make no objection in this instance, but I do not want to be bound to that practice.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will understand that it is not at my instance it is done.

Mr. TELLER. For fear of establishing the precedent that a Senator may give notice that he will speak at a certain time and then farm out the time of the Senate, I object.

TRUSTS AND PRICES OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask that there be laid before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and the amendment proposed by myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions referred to. Does the Senator desire to have them read?

Mr. BACON. If they will be considered as read and inserted in the RECORD at this point, I do not desire to consume the time of the Senate by having them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from Iowa and the amendment of the Senator from Georgia will be inserted in the RECORD.

The resolution submitted by Mr. DOLLIVER on the 18th instant is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to prepare and send to the Senate a statement showing what companies have been incorporated in the United States and what investments of capital made by individuals or copartnerships since the year 1900, outside and independent of the so-called "trusts," and the aggregate capital, compared with the total capitalization of the trust combinations.

The amendment of Mr. BACON to the foregoing resolution, submitted by him on the 21st instant, is as follows:

Add as an additional resolution the following:

"Resolved further, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to procure, so far as practicable, the information hereinafter specified, and report the same to the Senate during the present session of Congress if practicable.

"First. What classes of goods manufactured in the United States have, during the year ending December 31, 1903, been sold or offered for sale in foreign countries, or for export to foreign countries, by the manufacturers thereof, or through their representatives or agents, at prices less than the same classes of goods were during the same period sold in the United States by the manufacturers thereof, or through their representatives or agents; the said report, while including so far as practicable all classes of goods so manufactured and sold, to have special reference to manufactures of iron and steel and other metals, of glass and crockery, textile goods and the manufactures thereof, boots, shoes, and other manufactures of leather, hats and caps and other wearing apparel, household and kitchen utensils and wares, household and kitchen furniture, sewing machines, vehicles of all kinds, farm implements and farm machinery and other machinery of all kinds, cutlery and tools of all kinds, watches, jewelry, and other articles for household and personal use, comfort, or adornment; and the said report to give the comparative prices in said sales separately for each of the said classes of goods, and the foreign countries in which or for export to which said sales were made.

"Second. What, separately stated as to each class of goods, was the general average during the said period of the said comparative prices in sales in the United States and in the several foreign countries.

"Third. If, during the said period, the said comparative prices in any instances fluctuated materially from said average; then, stated separately, what were, in such instances, the comparative prices in said sales, in the several classes of goods embraced in such instances, at different periods in the year when said fluctuations occurred.

"The Secretary of Commerce and Labor is further directed to make said reports as soon as practicable, and if, when the same shall be completed, the Senate shall not be then in session, he is hereby directed to file same with the Secretary of the Senate, and there shall thereupon be copies of said reports immediately printed for the use of the Senate."

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter upon a discussion of the trust question in its broad scope, as would seem to be justified by the resolution offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. The fact is that his very exhaustive and conclusive speech leaves little to be said upon the trust question. At least, if his view is correct, it is certainly unnecessary to say anything more upon it. The Senator has found a very happy solution to this hitherto insoluble question, which, I presume, will result in its final disposition and removal from the field of discussion and debate. When divested of the oratoric garb in which the eloquent Senator clothed it, the proposition submitted by him him is, when viewed in its nudity, substantially that all trusts are divided into two classes, the good and the bad; that the good trusts are entirely beneficent and thus can do no harm, and therefore require no attention on our part; and that, happily for the public interests, the bad trusts have in them the inherent seeds of fatal disease, through the natural development of which they will certainly die, and that therefore no action is needed upon our part to hasten their early and inevitable demise.

If this suggestion of the learned and honorable Senator is correct, I repeat it is a most happy solution of the trust question, and we probably will hear no more of it, either in Congress or in the political campaign upon which we are about to enter.

The thing seems so simple which has thus been suggested by the learned Senator that each one of us is astonished that it had not occurred to any of us before. The country is certainly to be congratulated, however, that the matter has—by the ingenuity and eloquence of the Senator—been removed from all further necessity for investigation or action.

If the proposition of the Senator is correct, the converse of the proposition, I presume, might be recognized as a sound one—to wit, that if a trust has not died, that is conclusive evidence that it is a good trust, and it, in consequence, ought not to be interfered with. While that proposition may, under the logical demonstration of the Senator, as a general one, be perforce accepted by us as correct, in this as in all others there are notable exceptions, and the purpose I have to-day is to devote myself, in some measure, to the humbler task, not of a general discussion of the trust question, but of pointing out, if I may be able to do so, how, even in the case of a good trust, which we must assume to be the character of all existing trusts, because otherwise they would not be alive, there are some provisions of the present protective tariff law which enable that good trust to work hardship to the people and even to oppress them.

I am not even going, Mr. President, into the full field that that suggestion might authorize. I propose to limit myself to-day to the narrower consideration of the opportunity which some schedules of the protective tariff law, as it is now found upon the statute books, gives to these "good trusts"—undeniably good because they are alive and not dead—to sell to the people of the United States their products at from 25 to 100 per cent above the figures at which they can afford to sell to foreign consumers, and at which they do sell to foreign consumers.

The amendment which I have offered to the resolution of the Senator from Iowa is almost literally a copy of a resolution which I introduced in the Senate in December last. I would very much prefer, of course, that I might have the opportunity to discuss this question after the information intended to be gained by the resolution and this amendment had been obtained. But that is manifestly impossible now.

At the time when I introduced the resolution, in December, there was promptly a motion made by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to refer it to the Committee on Finance, and that was sufficient notice served that it was not intended that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor should have an opportunity to gain for us the information which we desired, and to report it to the Senate.

I presume, Mr. President, that it may be safely assumed that the objection of the Senator from Rhode Island, who, at least in the matter of tariff, is the mouthpiece of his party in this body, is and was a sufficient evidence of the fact that the procurement of that information and its conveyance to the public would not be to the interest of the party upholding the oppressive features of the particular law concerning the operation of which this information was sought to be had. It can not be doubted that if that information, when obtained, would show that there were no discriminations in prices between domestic and foreign consumers of our protected goods, so far from desiring to postpone the procurement of that information, the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island would have been eager to have had it produced.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. I will for a question; but I wish to state to the Senator that at half past 4 o'clock there is a special order to come before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was simply going to say that historical accuracy requires me to state that those resolutions were submitted, I think, in the very first days of the session. I simply gave notice that I would ask their reference to the Committee on Finance for the purpose of putting them into practical shape. I have not noticed any zeal on the part of the Senator from Georgia to secure information which might embarrass him in a speech of the kind he is now making. I do not know that he has since called up the resolutions.

Mr. BACON. From that I assume that the Senator from Rhode Island is in favor of the adoption of the resolutions now; and while we will not discuss the past, I shall be content if the Senator will lend his valuable aid to the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, with the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not recently had time to examine the resolutions of the Senator from Georgia; but if he will allow them to go to the Committee on Finance, I will see that they are put in some practical form.

Mr. BACON. The Senator indulges in pleasantry. I noticed when the Senator from Iowa introduced the resolution the Senator from Rhode Island was not anxious that there should be any supervision of it by the Committee on Finance; but so soon as this particular feature is touched, the sensitiveness of the Senator from Rhode Island is immediately developed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no doubt the Senator from Iowa at the proper time would ask to have his resolution referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. BACON. No; he will not, if he wishes its adoption. I hope that we may adopt the resolution, with my amendment, at this session, in order that the information may be had.

But, to resume, I remark that the obvious effect of a protective tariff provision is to increase the price to the consumer of the particular article affected by that part of the tariff schedule. That is the purpose of the protective tariff, so far as it exceeds the demands and requirements for revenue. It is not to be credited that the producer would favor a protective tariff as to his particular product if the effect of that feature of the tariff were to compel him to receive a less sum for his product than he would receive if the tariff law were not enacted.

Even if the general proposition is to be conceded that the protective tariff is beneficent, and that there is the general good to result from it in the alleged benefit flowing from the employment of labor in this country in the production of the article which is to be produced, and in the retention in the United States of the money which is spent by the consumer when he purchases the article—even if this general consideration is to be taken into account, it is not to be credited that there is a producer who is so public-spirited that he would be willing that the tariff should have that result, if it should be accompanied by the further result of a reduction of the price of the article produced by him. So that, from the most rational and commonplace consideration, we are justified in saying that the purpose and design of the protective tariff on a particular article is to enhance the price of it to the consumer of that article.

If, however, we accord to all consumers the patriotic spirit of self-sacrifice which would prompt them to be willing to submit to these increased prices for this general good, which is alleged to be the necessary result of the operation of a protective tariff, it is not unreasonable that these patriotic consumers, thus willing to sacrifice their personal interests for the general good, should be informed as to the degree in which this sacrifice is required of them, and that they should be informed as to whether or not the sacrifice thus required of them is within reasonable limits or whether it is unreasonable, oppressive, and extortionate.

Mr. President, if I do not trespass too far upon the time of the Senate, before I conclude I desire to say a word upon the subject of the distinction, even from the standpoint of the legitimate protectionist, between a legitimate tariff from that standpoint—the standpoint which I myself do not occupy, I will say in passing—and the extortionate rates which are included in some of the schedules which are oppressive to the people and far above anything which would be authorized by the tenets of those who claimed in the early days to be the fathers, the promoters, and the founders of the protective system. But I will not talk about that now, Mr. President, and it is possible that I may not reach that. I do not know.

I return, however, to the proposition that the consumer is entitled to know, even if he has this spirit of self-sacrifice, and even if he is a protectionist, whether the schedules are such that in their practical operation there is a limit within what he may consider to be legitimate bounds or whether they go far beyond that limit. A great many tests may be applied, but I am to-day going to confine myself, as I have said, within a very narrow line of inquiry in endeavoring to apply one test, which, while I concede it is not a conclusive test, is a valuable test in the fact that it may be said to be a concrete test. I am not going to indulge in generalities, I am not going to discuss abstract propositions, for while generalities and abstract propositions give more opportunity for oratorical display, they do not give the opportunity for the close test of argument which is furnished in a concrete presentation, and it is consequently my purpose to limit myself to a concrete presentation of this question as to whether or not the opportunity which is furnished to the domestic producer to sell to the domestic consumer his product at a rate of from 25 to 100 per cent higher than he sells to the foreign consumer is or is not evidence that the present tariff has any features which are abusive even of legitimate protection doctrine as laid down by those in the past who have been its advocates and great expounders.

I said, Mr. President, that this is not an infallible test, and I recognize that there may be circumstances under which the fact that a producer sells his product in a foreign market at less than he sells it in the domestic market may not be evidence of that which I think is found in the general practice of sales of that kind. I recognize the fact——

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I recognize the fact, of course, that the producer may sell his goods in a foreign market at less even than their cost to him, in order that he may introduce them. I recognize that there may be particular circumstances where, from competitive reasons, in order that a party may have the advantage thereafter to legitimately compete, he may for such reasons make a sacrifice by a sale in a foreign land at less than he could afford to do at a profit. Therefore I eliminate all of that and take none of that into the account. The consideration to which I invite the attention of the Senate is to cases where the regular business of the producer, not in isolated instances, but in his regular course of business, is to sell the product to the foreign consumer at from 25 to 50 or 100 per cent less than he sells it to the domestic consumer.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think because British or German producers sell their goods habitually in the United States at a less price than they do in their respective countries that this fact would be an evidence of inherent defect in the tariff system of either of those countries?

Mr. BACON. I do not exactly catch the Senator's inquiry; but if the Senator will allow me to proceed with the concrete instances to which I propose to bring his attention, possibly that may answer his question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Possibly, yes.

Mr. BACON. I say, Mr. President, that while it is not an infallible test it is a valuable test. For instance, if a manufacturer of sewing machines sells a sewing machine to a seamstress in this country for $25 and sells to the consumer in England the same machine for $15, there must be a reason for that discrimination in the price. He sells his machine for $15 in England because the English manufacturer stands there with his machine, equally good, which he sells at that price, and the American manufacturer must sell at that price or not sell at all. On the other hand, when the English manufacturer brings his sewing machine to America he must sell his machine at $25, because, before he can sell it he must not only include in his price the cost of manufacture and a reasonable profit, but the cost of transportation and the tariff, and that brings him up to the point where the price is the same as that at which the American manufacturer sells. He must either sell at $25 or not sell at all. Therefore it is a manifest and easily deduced conclusion that the difference between the price at which the American manufacturer sells his goods in England and the price at which he sells the same goods to the American consumer is a measure of the increase of price which he is enabled to secure by reason of the tariff. Home competition, if it exists, may lower that price.

Then there comes the natural inquiry as to whether or not, if he can afford to sell at $15 in England, the increased price of $25, at which he sells to the domestic consumer in America, does not indicate and conclusively show that the increase which the producer is allowed to exact from the domestic consumer is far above any legitimate need of a protective tariff law, even when considered from the standpoint of the protectionist himself. That is not a fancied illustration on my part, because, as I shall endeavor to show before I conclude, from the best evidence we are enabled to command now in the absence of the official report, which we had hoped to get through the medium of the Department of Commerce and Labor, those are the figures; but this is not limited to sewing machines by any means.

Mr. ALDRICH. Has the Senator mentioned the company that sells the machines?

Mr. BACON. No; but I shall mention some companies before I get through.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator is going to discuss the concrete question, I hope he will do that.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator, before I get through, will be fully satisfied of the fact that what I shall mention will be concrete cases.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope so.

Mr. BACON. I shall not leave the Senator anything to complain of in that regard.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that these enormous and oppressive discriminations, indicative as they are of extortionate tariff rates, are not limited to the matter of sewing machines or any other particular machine, but extend to almost all the articles of common use in this country in greater or less degree. They are not limited to matters of personal and private use, but they extend to articles which are consumed in public utilities, such as railroads—utilities in which these exorbitant prices are at last paid by those who are the patrons of those utilities.

In order that the patience of my learned and distinguished friend the Senator from Rhode Island may not be too far taxed, I will come to an immediate concrete case in that particular class of goods. We have pretty generally the information that the price of railroad iron and steel rails in this country is very much above what it would be but for the operation of the tariff; but, in order that we may have definite information on that subject from one who is authorized to speak, I will read something, and when I get through I shall be happy if the Senator from Rhode Island will let me know whether he thinks this is concrete or abstract.

I read an article which appeared in the Indianapolis News, and which was copied by the Washington Post, September 4, 1903. I will state that the object in reading the article is to read in the hearing of the Senate a letter from Mr. Schwab, which was copied in that article; but in order that the article may not be interrupted, I shall read the entire article in which this letter of Mr. Schwab to Mr. Frick is quoted. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that here is one of the concrete instances that I promised to give him.

The Indianapolis News says:

The standpatters, including Senator Marcus Aurelius Hanna, ought to be greatly interested in the book just published giving some of the facts concerning the steel business in the United States. The author prints the following letter, written by Mr. Schwab, late president of the steel trust, to Mr. Frick, and bearing the date of May 15, 1899.

Here is the letter:

As to the future, even on low prices, I am most sanguine. I know positively that England can not produce pig iron at the actual cost for less than $11.50 a ton, even allowing no profit on raw materials, and can not put pig iron into a rail with their most efficient work for less than $7.50 a ton. This would make rails at net cost to them at $19. We can sell at this price and ship abroad so as to net us $16 at works for foreign business, nearly as good as home business has been. What is true of rails is equally true of other steel products. As a result of this we are going to control the steel business of the world. You know we can make steel rails for less than $12 a ton, leaving a nice margin on foreign business. Besides this, foreign costs are going to increase year by year, because they have not the raw material, while ours is going to decrease. The result of all this is that we will be able to sell our surplus abroad, run our works full all the time, and get the best practice and costs in this way.

Without stopping to comment on that letter at this time, Mr. President, I will read the balance of the article from the Indianapolis News, which comments upon it. The Indianapolis News, commenting on it, says:

We do not wonder that Mr. Schwab took an optimistic view of the situation. For at the very time that he wrote his letter, saying that rails could be made in this country for less than $12 a ton and that they could be sold at $16 at a good profit, rails were selling in this country at $25 and $26 behind a tariff duty of $7.84 a ton. The price now is $28 a ton, or more than double the actual cost of production and $12 above the figure at which Schwab says they can be profitably sold.

And yet we are told that the tariff must not be touched. We are to protect our steel-rail men against the English mills, when, according to Schwab, it costs those mills at least $7 a ton more than it does in this country to make rails. And this after the English have bought their pig iron at cost. This is the sort of foreign cheapness against which our trusts must be protected. More than this, Schwab says that we can sell rails in England on the basis of the actual cost of producing an English rail and have a margin of more than $4 a ton profit. How about standing pat on $7.84 duty on steel rails? The only effect of it is to keep the price at twice the cost of production and so to pour millions of dollars of the people's money into the pockets of a few millionaires. The duty just about makes up the difference between the price of English rails, counting that to be $19 a ton, and the present exorbitant price now charged by the steel trust.

There is a concrete instance from which, by the testimony of Mr. Schwab himself, it appears that while rails are selling at $28 a ton in the United States, he alleges that he can deliver them in England at a cost that will compete with the English rails at $16 a ton, and that that is $4 a ton above what it it will cost him to do it—that even at that rate he would have $4 a ton profit.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. The iron producers of Alabama and the surrounding States, who have been for the past few years selling their pig iron for eighteen or twenty dollars a ton, would be convinced with difficulty that steel rails can be made for $12 a ton, whether the statement comes from Mr. Schwab or anybody else. The story and the deductions from it are simply absurd.

Mr. BACON. The statements, you will remember, are from a confidential letter—a private letter of Mr. Schwab to his associate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not care how private it is. The statement as applied to existing conditions is absolutely untrue and impossible.

Mr. BACON. I say "private" not for the purpose of conveying any other impression than that Mr. Schwab in making that statement could not have been influenced by any public purpose. He was simply conferring with his associate, his colaborer in the enterprise, as to what was the future of the business in which they were thus mutually interested.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the cost of steel rails, like the cost of everything else, depends upon the cost of the material and the labor which goes into it.

Mr. BACON. I have not got through.

Mr. ALDRICH. And there might be a possible cost of iron ore, of pig iron, and of labor that would reduce the cost of steel rails to $12 per ton, but to say that they can be produced to-day or could have been produced at any time within the last three or four years, when the price of pig iron itself—which is one of the constituent elements of steel rails—has been so high, is a ridiculous statement.

Mr. BACON. I have not got through with the concrete case yet. It is not necessary, Mr. President, that it should be so extreme as the Senator says the statement of Mr. Schwab is. It would be an awful iniquity if it were that extreme; it would be still an iniquity if it were half so extreme.

Now, let me give you a few figures on that subject to see where it leads.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator did me the honor to listen to me in a very uninteresting speech the other day and did not interrupt me. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, except to ask about the document from which he has been reading. My attention was distracted.

Mr. BACON. I am reading an article from the Indianapolis News, which was reproduced in the Washington Post of September 4, 1903, in which there was quoted a letter written by Mr. Schwab to Mr. Frick of the date of May 15, 1899.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I think that identical letter appears in what is rather a history of the steel industry in the United States, recently written and published by a former private secretary of Andrew Carnegie.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. The reason of my inquiry, Mr. President, was that I find in the review of the evidence of the Industrial Commission, which is signed by distinguished Democrats as well as Republicans, that Mr. Schwab, on page 25 of that review, does not talk quite as he did in that letter. I commend the Senator's attention to page 25.

Mr. BACON. That is all right. If the Senator will allow me to proceed with the presentation of the matter with some degree of continuity, I shall be more than glad if, when I get through, the learned and distinguished Senators will proceed with this discussion, because the more the subject is discussed the more light we shall get. We want all the light we can get, and I shall be more than delighted to have the matter further discussed. I am not one of those who are in a hurry to close this session on Thursday; I am willing to stay here just so long as the public business requires it, and just so long as the discussion of great public questions will give light to the people of the United States as to these matters in which they are so deeply and practically interested. So I hope the Senators will reserve the information which they have, in order that they may present it with some more degree of elaboration than they can do simply in the way of interruption. I shall feel the utmost pleasure if Senators will continue this discussion after I have concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I was going to consider what was the practical operation of the most remarkable information thus disclosed to us by Mr. Schwab. I have here some figures showing the amount of rails consumed in the United States since the enactment of the Dingley bill, in which there is the tariff of $7.84 a ton on steel rails. I find that there has been consumed in the United States for the six years beginning in 1898 and ending in 1893—those are fiscal years, as I understand—12,686,434 tons of steel rails. Of that amount all was of domestic production except 142,192 tons, leaving a total of 12,544,242 tons as the amount of domestic steel rails manufactured and consumed in the United States in those six years.

Recognizing the contradiction which the Senator from Rhode Island makes to the correctness of Mr. Schwab's figures, but assuming, for the purpose of this argument, that Mr. Schwab is correct, we have from his figures, in a concrete form—not abstract—what has been the total amount in those six years under the operations of the Dingley bill that the people of the United States have paid for rails over and above what Mr. Schwab says would have been the price at a reasonable profit. That excessive price thus exacted from the domestic consumer has been made possible through the steel schedule of the protective tariff, because, in the absence of the protective tariff, the steel rails of the British manufacturer would have been here to compete with the American product unless the American producer sold rails to the American consumer at a reasonable price. The practical effect of lowering the tariff on steel rails to a reasonable rate would be that the American producer would still sell to the American consumer, but he would be compelled to do so at a reasonable price. As shown by the statement of Mr. Schwab, the British manufacturer could not compete in the United States with the American manufacturer at $20 a ton after he had added the cost of transportation to the cost of production.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, Mr. President, the very statement the Senator read from shows that in Great Britain steel rails can not be made for the figures at which they are made here.

Mr. BACON. What is that?

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose the duty should be taken off and the price had been the price quoted in the letter to which the Senator has referred, what would the American consumer then have to pay? Not $12 a ton, for steel rails have never sold in Great Britain or in any other country in the world for $12 a ton.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the point is this: For the purpose of this presentation I am assuming that Mr. Schwab is correct. I recognize the contradiction of the Senator from Rhode Island of the correctness of the fact; but assuming it to be correct from that standpoint, what is the conclusion? The statement of Mr. Schwab is that he could sell steel rails at $16 a ton and make $4 a ton profit. Therefore $16 a ton would afford a legitimate profit. But as he sells them, in fact, at $28 a ton, we have the statement which I have just made, that there is $12 a ton over and above what would be, according to Mr. Schwab's own statement, a legitimate profit of $4 a ton.

Mr. ALDRICH. In other words, the American producer of steel rails has been able to add $16 a ton profit to his entire production on account of a $7.84 duty!

Mr. BACON. Very well. The Senator from Rhode Island does not need to be told by me that not only has there to be added the duty, but the cost of transportation, and the two together make up the $12 a ton and not $16, as stated by the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. It costs less to transport——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, the difference between the $16 and the $28 is the difference made up by the $7.84 of tariff duty and the cost of transportation.

Mr. ALDRICH. It costs less to transport steel rails from the mills of Great Britain and Belgium to New England than it does from the mills of the United States.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not going to stop at this point to discuss the question which has been raised between the learned Senator and Mr. Schwab. I am discussing this matter now from the standpoint of Mr. Schwab's testimony. If the Senator can show hereafter that Mr. Schwab's testimony is not admissible, that is another matter, but I was discussing this from the standpoint of Mr. Schwab's testimony.

We have this remarkable fact, that in the six years during which the Dingley Act has been in operation the consumers of the United States have had from the domestic producers of steel rails 12,544,242 tons, and that, if Mr. Schwab's testimony is correct, the profit of $12 a ton over and above the $4 profit which he said would be satisfactory to him from his foreign consumer—with the profit of $12 a ton greater than that which he charged to his foreign consumer, the people of the United States have in that time paid for steel rails $150,530,904 more than the same rails would have been sold for to foreign consumers. The average price of rails in that time has been about $28 per ton.

Mr. ALDRICH. How is that chargeable to the protective tariff?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I can not conceive why the Senator would ask me that question unless he wants to put me upon the stand to see whether or not I understand the most elementary principles of prices. I can not stop, of course, unless I propose to abandon the presentation of this argument, to do more than to say this to the Senator——

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. I shall not interrupt him.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator knows, I do not object to any legitimate interruption, and I do not say that his suggestion is illegitimate. If it were not for the notice given for half past 4, I should not object to any sort of interruption, but I shall endeavor to answer the Senator anyhow.

The Senator asks how it is that $28 a ton, which the American steel-rail manufacturer exacts of the American consumer, when he avows his readiness to sell at $16 a ton to the foreign consumer, is to be attributed to the tariff? Well, I suppose that it is an easily recognized fact that the object of a protective tariff is to keep out the foreign competitor, and that the reason why this $28 a ton is available to the American producer when dealing with his American consumer is that the foreign manufacturer is by reason of the protective tariff excluded from competition.

Mr. ALDRICH. But certainly the domestic producer is only protected to the extent of the duty, unless there are some other advantages given to him.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. With great pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not need to assist the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. That is all right.

Mr. BAILEY. Because that is plainly not necessary; but the Senator from Rhode Island knows it costs more to produce those rails in Great Britain than it does here, according to the testimony of experts, and it would be impossible for them to compete against our steel-rail manufacturers without a tariff——

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not accept the experts nor the statement.

Mr. BAILEY. But it is true, notwithstanding the Senator from Rhode Island does not accept it.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. And Mr. Schwab states in this letter that they can not manufacture steel rails there for less than $19, while we can manufacture them at $12 and can sell them at $16 a ton.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the fact that they can not manufacture for less than $19 attributable to our tariff?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. That is not what I intended to say. But when they can not manufacture there for less than $19, against our manufacturing cost of $12 here, they can not compete with us without a tariff. Nevertheless, in spite of that, we add $7.84, and thus that $7.84 added to the English price of $19 would make the cost price of the English rails laid down here $26.84 a ton.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. One moment. The American manufacturer, knowing that the English steel-rail manufacturer can not undersell him at any figure below $26.84, plus the carrying charges, proceeds to assess the difference against the American people.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will not impeach the intelligence of the Senator from Texas sufficiently to say that he himself believes the statement he has just made. Why is it, if the manufacturers and producers of steel rails in Great Britain can not produce them at less than $19 per ton, and the producers in the United States can produce them at $12 a ton, that Great Britain and Germany still have the markets of the world and we have only a small export trade? The statement, then, answers itself. If we can sell steel rails at $12 a ton at a profit, we should have the markets of the world in twenty-four hours in spite of Great Britain with her $19 cost. The fact that we do not export steel rails in great quantities, that we are not selling them in the markets of the world, and that we have not absorbed the business of the whole world, answers the Senator's statement.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble with the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble with the Senator from Rhode Island is that he does not take the price at the time Mr. Schwab states it in his letter. At the risk of interrupting the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. BACON. Go ahead.

Mr. BAILEY. Longer than I desire, I want to say that that letter was written to Mr. Frick when he was fixing the value of the great properties that constitute the trust whose success my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] so eloquently praised. It was in determining what would be the probable profits of that trust that Mr. Schwab wrote this letter to Mr. Frick.

Mr. ALDRICH. In other words, it was a stock-jobbing and not a business statement.

Mr. BAILEY. It was made to Mr. Frick for his information. I am not here to say that Republican manufacturers undertake to deceive the unsuspecting public—I have no doubt that some of them do—but I undertake to say that Mr. Schwab is as reputable and as truthful as any man who ever filched money from the pockets of the American people through the agency of a protective tariff. The testimony the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has in front of him shows that Mr. Schwab had candor, under oath, to say that the American manufacturers of steel rails are selling their goods cheaper in foreign countries than to the American consumers.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he gave various reasons for it, the principal one being that there was an advantage in labor.

Mr. BAILEY. I will not state his reasons. I repeat his statement. He had the candor to say it—a candor which some others would do well to imitate. There is no doubt that the prices which Mr. Schwab stated in his letter were correct at that time, but the Senator from Rhode Island knows that the cost of producing pig iron varies from year to year. It has gone down from as high as $20 per ton to as low as a fraction over $7. Of course, this variation in the price of raw material varies the cost of producing the finished product.

I take this statement of Mr. Schwab, and notwithstanding the expert knowledge of the Senator from Rhode Island on all the tariff schedules he must stand second to Mr. Schwab, whose rise in the steel industry of this country is one of the romances of that great development. Beginning a boy as a day laborer, he rose to the presidency of the greatest steel corporation ever organized in the history of the world, and he rose through his unaided exertion and through his peculiar knowledge of the industry. Therefore, when Mr. Schwab fixes the cost of producing steel rails in this country and steel rails in Great Britain I accept it even as against the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. But I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether steel rails can be produced in the United States today or could have been produced last year or the year before last at $12 a ton?

Mr. BAILEY. No; because the price of pig iron varies; but that does not affect the profit.

Mr. ALDRICH. But it affects the statement of the Senator from Georgia, who has taken the last six or eight years in fixing the cost to the American people.

Mr. BACON. As I was saying, it is not necessary that that $12 a ton should be entirely accurate. That would be a most monstrous iniquity. I say that if it were even a half or a fourth of that, it is an iniquity.

Mr. BAILEY. Of the protective tariff.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of it as if by reason of the protective tariff. If not simply $12 a ton, but the half of $12 a ton over and above the cost at which they can sell at a profit to foreign consumers, is charged to the domestic consumer, it is an iniquity, only less in degree.

But I was trying to argue this question upon the assumption that Mr. Schwab was reliable. It will be for the Senators to show that he is not to be relied upon. Let them give us not their fragmentary views in the way of interruptions in my speech, but something that can go to the country that shall be based on authoritative statistics, and not upon their denial simply of an assertion made by a man who, as stated by the Senator from Texas, stands at the very head and front of the steel industry, and a man presumed above all other men in this country to be able to speak authoritatively and truthfully of it.

I had, when interrupted, just called attention to the fact that if Mr. Schwab's statement is correct, the American consumer within six years that have elapsed since the enactment of this schedule in the Dingley Act, which gives $7.84 a ton to steel rails, has been required to pay $150,530,904 above the price that Mr. Schwab said was the price at which he could sell them at a profit.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why does the Senator confine himself to the Dingley tariff rate upon steel rails? The rate upon steel rails fixed by the Gorman-Wilson Act was $7.84. Why not go back and show what the cost was to the country under a Democratic Administration?

Mr. BACON. If that were so, it would be none the less an iniquity if it gave opportunity for these discriminations, and when attention is called to it it ought to be corrected by those who now have the power to correct it.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the sum would be very much larger if the Senator would take in the whole Democratic Administration.

Mr. BACON. For the purpose of the argument I grant what the Senator says, but here we find a condition. It matters not who is responsible for it in the past, here is a condition under which there is an extortion upon the consumer, and who has the power to make the correction? Who has the power to correct it? I care not where it originated. If it can be shown that it originated in Democratic Administration and if it can be shown to be an iniquitous schedule, the Republican party to-day is the one in power, capable of correcting it and relieving the people of the burden. Does it answer the question to say you are not the authors of this, when you have the power to-day to correct it and will not do it? It matters not where it came from or when it originated.

I am, Mr. President, presenting these figures for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Republican party the fact that there is this abuse of our tariff system, and that they have the power to correct this and other like abuses, and that they do not do it. I am bringing it to the attention of the Senate for the purpose, if I have the time hereafter, of showing that this criticism is in a line with the utterances of the Republican party in different parts of the country, and notably in the State of Iowa, and for the purpose of asking Senators and the Republican party in Congress to carry out what the Republican party in the State of Iowa announced as its purpose, to revise those portions of the existing tariff law as furnished a shelter for the trusts, and not hurriedly to adjourn this Congress and leave the people under this burden, not simply as to steel rails, but as to almost all other articles of consumption by the people, both in their private business and in the public utilities of the country.

Now, sir, if it be true that within that time, according to the figures of Mr. Schwab, $1,530,904 have been exacted and taken from the American consumer over and above what would have been charged to a foreign customer, it is an important matter to be considered that this does not altogether fall on the railroads. It is at last paid by those who patronize the railroads. Men put their money into railroads not for the purpose of throwing it away, but for the purpose of investment, through which they receive from those who patronize the roads the return of the money which they put in, with a reasonable profit thereon. More than $150,000,000 has been paid by the great masses of the American people. Every man who patronizes an American railroad, who rides upon it, or ships a pound of freight has paid his part of that $150,000,000. And of this vast amount which the people have thus paid every dollar has gone into treasure chests of the makers of steel rails. The tariff law alone has made it necessary for the people to pay this stupendous sum, but not one dollar of it has come into the public Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask another question? and I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. BACON. I am delighted to hear the Senator, but it would be so much better if the Senator would make a speech in his own time. I want to hear him.

Mr. ALDRICH. I promise not to interrupt him again.

Mr. BACON. I do not exact any such promise from the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wanted to know whether the Senator has made the same calculation in regard to all the other items of American production?

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. And if he can, to show exactly how much the protective tariff costs the American people.

Mr. BACON. No; I have not.

Mr. ALDRICH. One hundred and fifty million dollars does not represent the total range of American production. The protective tariff must cost the American people thousands of millions of dollars, according to the view of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is undoubtedly correct in that suggestion. I would like to have something to say on that subject, if time permitted. We have been told that American manufactures consumed in the United States annually amount to some $13,000,000,000. It would be a most interesting inquiry how much of this thirteen thousand millions of dollars annually thus paid by the American people represents the actual cost and a fair profit on the articles purchased with this sum, and how much of it, as in the case of the steel rails, represents a stupendous tribute wrung from the people under the operations of a public tariff law and stuffed into the money vaults of private parties. Some assistance can be rendered in such an investigation by the knowledge of the fact that the average protective duty under the Dingley Act is nearly, if not quite, 50 per cent.

But to return to the sale of steel rails to American consumers. If more than $150,000,000 has, under the operation of this law, been taken from the pockets of the American people in excess of that at which Mr. Schwab himself says he would be willing to sell the same property in England, no wonder is it that one of the chief beneficiaries under this particular system announces that he is ready, if necessary, out of his own pocket, to pay the campaign expenses of the Republican party in the coming Presidential election; and no wonder that the chief concern engaged in the steel industry is reported to have made an annual dividend of more than $140,000,000, and that upon a capitalization three-fourths of which is reputed to be wind or water.

Now, Mr. President, as the Senator from Rhode Island objects to the figures of Mr. Schwab, I am going to give him something a little more concrete, about which he can not object, because the facts are not to be disputed. I hold in my hand a letter written to me personally by Mr. James T. Wright, vice-president and general manager of the Macon, Dublin and Savannah Railroad Company. I will state that he is an Indianian and a Republican and so avows himself in this letter. By his request, in reading the letter—though I will show it to the Senator privately, if he desires it, so that there will be no trouble about that—I do not give the names of the companies with which he dealt. As he requests me not to do it, I do not care to have published in the records of the country the names of the companies. It is addressed to me and dated February 23, 1904. I will read the entire letter:

MACON, GA., February 23, 1904.

Hon. A. O. BACON, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to own receipt of yours of the 20th, and have carefully noted same.

I recall very distinctly my conversation with you on the subject of steel rails purchased by my company from the —— company, and I take pleasure in giving you the details of the transaction, asking you, however, to refrain from mentioning the names of the parties.

The extension of our road, some 40 miles, was decided upon and cash provided for it early in the spring of 1901. Owing to the demand at that time for steel in all forms and the probability of an advance in price, it seemed wise to take up the matter of the purchase of the necessary rails at once. Inquiries, therefore, were addressed and mailed to all the leading steel-rail manufacturers in the country, asking for tenders on 60 miles of 70-pound steel rail delivered at Savannah or Macon, the point of delivery to be optional with us.

We received prompt responses, but there was practically no difference in the bids, the eastern rail mills contiguous to tide water quoting practically the same price delivered at Savannah and a correspondingly higher price for Macon delivery, the interior rail mills making a lower price for Macon delivery and a higher price for Savannah delivery. It was very evident to me that the field had been divided by the manufacturers and that no one of them would encroach upon the territory assigned to the others.

After endeavoring in vain to obtain better prices than those quoted, we finally accepted the bid of the —— Steel Company, and placed our order with them for 5,618 tons of rail at $29 per ton, based upon delivery at tide water. This would enable us to arrange our own freight rate to Savannah and effect some saving in the cost of the rails. The order was declined on these terms, the —— Steel Company refusing to make any price f. o. b. mill, but insisting upon delivered price.

The matter was then taken up with interior mills, who were perfectly willing to make a price f. o. b. mill, but we were unable to obtain any concession in all-rail rates which would reduce the cost of the rail below that quoted by the —— Steel Company for delivery at Savannah.

The whole transaction in the meantime had been handled by wire, owing to the demands of the —— Steel Company that it be closed at once, as the price would be advanced.

I made one more effort. Some friends of mine were interested in a railroad project in Central America, and I broached the subject to the representative of the —— Steel Company who had come here to close the matter with me. I told him that my friends had made some inquiry of me as to the cost of construction in that country, and I should like to know—

I am just coming to the point now that will interest the Senator from Rhode Island, and I trust that he will not leave the Chamber before I finish it—and I should like to know at what price he would sell me steel rails delivered at tide water for shipment to Honduras. He promptly quoted me $20 per ton. Further inquiry developed the fact, however, that they would only load vessels chartered to a foreign port, and that the charter should be an essential part of the contract. The wall was complete. There was nothing left for me to do but to place my order and to thank God it was no worse, as within two days thereafter steel rails advanced $3 per ton.

Allowing a liberal amount for cost of delivery at tide water, which in this particular case would have been very small, we American citizens paid to this American industry $23,000 in excess of what foreigners would have been compelled to pay. And $23,000 would have put up a very handsome library filled with standard books on protection.

And this was a very small transaction—only 50 miles of railroad! Payments were cash, and we neither needed nor asked any concessions in the matter of time. Because we were Americans, interested in the development of a small section of our country, involving faith and sacrifices, we were compelled to pay out as a bonus in excess of $500 per mile.

These are the facts. Unfortunately I had only the verbal quotation on the rails for foreign shipment, but I have no doubt that it was at least the top of the market, but I have the full correspondence in my files covering the rest of the transaction.

Owing to the necessity for prompt action, I was unable to secure prices from foreign rail makers, but it would be foolish to imagine that that avenue had not also been closed to us.

I have written you hurriedly, and may not have given you all the facts or as clearly as you desire. If there is still opportunity and I can further elucidate the matter, please advise me, and I shall take pleasure in doing so.

For purely business reasons I must ask you not to mention the names I have given. Personally I should like to see it given the widest publicity; and if the statement is of any use to you, I shall be glad, as an American and as a Republican.

Very truly, yours, J. T. WRIGHT.

Mr. ALDRICH. Transactions of this kind have been common in the commercial world——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me. If he has any question to ask, I will yield for a question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not any question.

Mr. BACON. I can not permit him to interject a speech.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was only about to say——

Mr. BACON. No; if the Senator has a question, I will reply; but I object to the Senator making a speech. However, I do hope he will take occasion to make a speech in his own time in reply to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was only about to concede that transactions of this kind have taken place in the United States and in the commercial world from the beginning of time down to the present moment.

Mr. BACON. That is all right.

Mr. ALDRICH. They are not the product of a protective tariff either here or elsewhere.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will take occasion to state that with some degree of elaboration and fortify what he has to say, not simply to give us the dicta of his own assertion. Let us have facts and figures. We will be very glad to have the Senator enter the arena of debate and not content himself simply with interruptions and dicta without any facts to substantiate and fortify the statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the resolution I introduced here in December had been permitted to pass, and if the Department of Commerce and Labor, with its large facilities and ample means, had been permitted to gather the information which was sought in that resolution, we might not be in the position of having to stand upon the statement of Mr. Schwab or upon the dicta of the learned and distinguished Senator from Rhode Island; but we might have had, and I presume would have had here to-day, authoritative statements officially uttered and conveyed to us by the great statistical Department of this Government. I trust that while it has been postponed we will have, under the opportunity furnished by the resolution offered by my learned and distinguished friend from Iowa and the amendment which I have ventured to propose to the same, this information in time that the people may have it during this summer.

Ought not the people to have the information? If what the Senator from Rhode Island says is true, and there is nothing in that information which would be of disadvantage to those who claim that the particular provisions of the Dingley Act under which these abuses have grown are correct and should not be changed, what have they to lose? And if it be not true—if, on the contrary, it be a fact that these oppressions and extortions are permissible under the Dingley Act—ought not the people of the United States to have knowledge of that fact when they come to pass upon the questions that will be submitted to them in November? Not from a political standpoint as to them, but from their great material interests, are they not entitled to have this information?

Now, Mr. President, I have another letter here, from a railroad president. It is not quite as concrete in all its statements as the other, but still it is as to one statement, and as to the others it is sufficiently so to at least indicate that this Congress will fail in its duty if it omits and refuses to have the definite information which can be secured through the investigation to be made by the Department of Commerce and Labor.

I am sorry the Senator from Rhode Island is not here to hear this letter, but he will probably have the opportunity to see it in the RECORD. It is written to me by the president of the National Railroad Company of Mexico, who is to me personally known. The National Railroad Company of Mexico is owned by Englishmen in the main, and the president of it is a railroad man from my own State. He was formerly the president of the Central Railroad of Georgia. He has his office in New York City. He spends his time alternately at his office and upon the line of his railroad in Mexico. It is a long railroad, extending from Laredo, in the State of Texas, to the City of Mexico, 840 miles, and there is a continuation of it several hundred miles long in the State of Texas, running from Laredo down to a point on the Gulf—Corpus Christi. The railroad altogether is some thirteen hundred miles in length.

I call attention to the facts stated by Mr. Raoul, who is a Louisianian by birth. He lived in Georgia ever since a young man, until he undertook this work about fifteen years ago. He has been for about fifteen years president of this railroad, and is now about to go out of the presidency of it to take charge of a railroad in Georgia. That accounts for certain statements made in this letter. It is in order that he may be understood that I mention that fact.

The facts which he states here I have myself had from him in years past verbally. I have made two trips with him to Mexico over his line of railroad, and in that way had opportunity, aside from frequent association with him in other places, to hear him say a great deal about the business of his railroad and everything connected with it. I had previously heard from him the statement that in dealing with manufacturers in the United States the prices charged him for goods which he was to use upon the part of his railroad in Mexico were very much under the prices charged to him by the same parties for the same goods to be used on the part of his railroad in the State of Texas. Recollecting that fact, I wrote him when this matter was first being considered by me, asking him to give me some detailed information upon that subject that I might use it in this debate, stating to him that I only asked him to do so in case it would not embarrass him. Here is his letter, written from New York February 25:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 20th. It would not be any embarrassment for me to give you the information you ask if it were possible for me to do so, but I believe it will not be practicable. I am so overwhelmed with work preparatory to getting my affairs in shape for leaving my present position with the company that I have no time to devote to anything outside of my official work, and to get any accurate information would require going back into the files of the purchasing agent's office, and the man who is familiar with this whole business is leaving for Mexico City to-day.

For a long time past all our purchases have been made on the basis of export prices even though they have occasionally stopped in Texas, the competition being keen enough to produce this cut in prices in favor of the Texas shipments, so that it has been some time past since we have had any material differences, but those differences do exist and to an iniquitous extent. I use the word "iniquitous" because it certainly seems so to me when the citizens of the United States are required under the laws of the country to pay a higher price to the manufacturers than these same manufacturers are willing to make and sell to foreign people for. In 1902 I secured bids on steel rails for Mexico from United States mills at about $24 delivered at Tampico, while the price I paid at the same time for rail for our road in Texas was $28 at the mills.

I have understood that the Canadian Pacific has just bought a large lot of rails from the United States Steel Corporation at $21. It is asserted and denied that the $21 is for delivery at Montreal. If it is, the price at the mill would be about $19, while the price for United States roads is still $28 at the mills. I do not know this of my own knowledge, and it is merely current report.

When I saw that you had introduced a bill in Congress to inquire into these differences in prices, I was very much pleased that you had started the inquiry, and intended to write you a line expressing myself in that sense, but I was interrupted by one thing and another, and finally it escaped me. The source from which you are seeking to get this information will be official and thoroughly authentic, and it seems to me it should supply you with material quite sufficient to establish your case.

* * * * * * *

With kind regards, I remain, yours, very truly,

W. G. RAOUL.

I stop there to note that the $24 was the price, delivered at Tampico, for rails which were to be used for a part of the road in Mexico. Of course, from the $24 was necessarily deducted the cost of transportation, so far as the receipt of the manufacturer is concerned, and for the road, so far as it lay in Texas, at the mills the price was $28 a ton. So if you allow even $4 as the cost of transportation, there was a difference of $8 a ton between the price charged by the manufacturers for rails sold to the same party where he was to use a part of them in Texas and to use the other part in Mexico.

Twenty-four dollars was the price at Tampico, and in that case, of course, the manufacturer paid the freight to Tampico, and that was for rails to be used in Mexico; but for rails which were to be used in Texas the price was $28 at the mills, which would have required the railroad company, of course, to pay the freight.

If $4 was the cost of transportation at a difference of $8 a ton between the price charged by the maker of the steel rails to the same person where he had a railroad line partly in Texas and partly in Mexico, he paid $8 more for the rail to be laid in Texas than for the rail to be laid in Mexico.

Mr. BLACKBURN. At the same time.

Mr. BACON. At the same time; not, as suggested by the learned Senator from Rhode Island, when there was a difference in pig iron or the cost of labor or anything else. Here is $8 a ton, about representing the difference made up by the $7.84 a ton duty.

I should like, if the learned Senator were present, to ask him if that is a sufficiently concrete presentation for him, and certainly he will not say in this case or in the case of Mr. Wright, the vice-president and general manager of the railroad, whose letter I have just read, that there is any doubt as to the correctness of the statements. In the case of Mr. Schwab, it was an estimate, and he may be in some error, but, as stated by the Senator from Texas, an estimate made under circumstances entitled to every credit as to its correctness, because it was an estimate by Mr. Schwab in all probability while conferring with his copartner as to what would be the values of securities which they were then about to put on the market, and not the price which Mr. Schwab was giving to the customer who contemplated the purchase of such securities.

But while it was an estimate in that case, in each of these two cases here are the actual prices stated by a customer. In each case it is the same rail by the same manufacturer to the same customer at the same time, and in each case there is a discrimination of the price to this same customer of the same rail at the same time as between the rail to be used in the foreign country and the rail to be used at home.

Mr. President, I repeat I am not to-day endeavoring to make a general argument against the protective tariff. I am not to-day arguing any general proposition. Some Senators are here now who were not here when I began. I repeat what I said then, that the object of the presentation which I am endeavoring to make is to show to the Republican party, to the dominant party in the Senate and in the other House, the abuses of the protective tariff system as found in some schedules of the Dingley Act, even if viewed from the standpoint of an ordinary protective tariff; and I am asking, as I asked the Senator from Rhode Island, regardless of whether or not the same conditions were found under the Democratic tariff as are now found under the Republican tariff, why is it, unless they approve of these abuses, that the Republican party, with unlimited power to legislate, will not attempt to correct these abuses? That is the object I have to-day in what I say.

But, Mr. President, in the absence of this official information which we have desired and which we are now seeking, we have had, of course, to look to various sources in the effort to get the necessary information. I call attention now to other pieces of information, which, while in some instances the evidence may not be conclusive, it is certainly sufficiently authentic to put the Congress of the United States upon notice of the fact that the people of the United States under some schedules of the Dingley tariff act are being oppressed, and that unreasonable prices are being exacted from them, which are extortionate, even from the standpoint of a protectionist.

Here is a clipping which I have from a newspaper, the name of which I unfortunately did not put down; but as it refers to the document by name from which it gets the information, if the statements herein contained are incorrect the fact can be ascertained and the truth made known. The article to which I refer is as follows:

In a recent pamphlet Mr. Henry Loomis Nelson, former editor of Harper's Weekly, shows the utter fallacy of the assertion, so frequently made, that the trusts have reduced prices. He shows, for instance, that the average yearly "base" price of wire nails per keg has increased since 1894 from $1.11 to $2.60, the present price being $3.53; and the price of barbed wire from $1.80 in 1897 to $3.17 in 1899, the present price being $4.13. The profits of the trust run from $8,000,000 to $15,000,000 a year, the increase of price being nearly all profit. It has, however, by its increase of prices, greatly reduced the consumption of wire fencing, and in 1896 the consumption of cut and wire nails was reduced by a former trust about 1,000,000 kegs. While the trust raises the price of its goods to the American farmer and mechanic, it sells to the foreigner for much less. In 1896, for example, the price of nails to foreigners was $1.30 and to Americans $2.70. In 1898 the retail price to Americans was about $4.50 and to foreigners $3.14 "base," or about $3.10 retail a keg. It was possible to buy at export price, ship the goods to Europe, bring them back, and even then undersell the trust's domestic prices. In 1899 the trust exported 51,000,000 pounds of wire nails to its former foreign customers and 215,000,000 pounds of wire.

Now, I call attention to the statement there in connection with the former statement by me, that I was not claiming that every sale made in a foreign country at a less price than made in this country was an evidence that the protective tariff as to that particular schedule was giving an undue advantage, but that I was limiting myself to the cases where these were in the regular course of trade or business; and here this author, Mr. Henry Loomis Nelson, calls attention to the fact that in one year, in 1899, the trust exported 51,000,000 pounds of iron nails to foreign customers and 215,000,000 pounds of wire.

Those do not indicate transactions such as those which I freely admit are to be excepted from the criticism, and show that it is not the business of that kind, but that it is in the ordinary course of their regular trade. The article continues:

Mr. Nelson demonstrates by these and other illustrations that the protective tariff, whatever the intended object of it may be, is practically for the benefit of a comparatively small class of persons at the expense of the many. The beneficiaries of protection are sheltered from foreign competition by the tariff and from domestic competition by the trusts which they have formed.

Now, Mr. President, the figures which I have given as to the exorbitant amount which has been exacted and collected from the American people under the steel-rail schedule of the tariff act amounted to over $150,000,000, but I call attention in that connection to the fact that Mr. Schwab, in the same letter to Mr. Frick, states:

What is true of rails is equally true of other steel products.

Therefore, if it be true, as stated by Mr. Schwab, that by reason of the difference in prices at which he was selling in the United States and the price at which he could sell at $4 profit in England there was $12 a ton to be received by the producer of steel rails, it is also true under his statement as to all other steel products.

Mr. President, I have not the figures, but I presume it will be generally recognized that the steel products of the country other than rails far exceed the product of rails in value and amount. The steel product enters into all the industrial business of life. In this country, at least, it has been very much enlarged. Things which formerly were served by wood now require iron. Important houses, bridges, structures of all kinds, implements, farming implements, which were formerly of wood are now of iron. So you might run through the whole category of mechanical industries, and the fact is presented that in this large degree the producers of steel, under the present steel schedule, are enabled to exact what is at least, according to this computation, 75 per cent above the reasonable profit; not 75 per cent on the cost, because, if what Mr. Schwab says is true, the profit on the steel rail is 75 per cent above the $4 profit, and that is true, approximately, under that statement, of all the steel products of the country.

Nor is it limited to steel or iron products by any means. We are, as I said, under the necessity of going to sources for information which may not be as thorough as they would be if the information had been given to us by the Department of Commerce and Labor. But I read from an article in the Savannah Press—a newspaper published in Savannah, Ga.—of December 14, 1903, in which there is set out the difference in prices charged in this country and the prices charged in foreign countries for the same articles by domestic producers. The article, after some personal mention, says:

This is one of the freaks of the tariff. For instance, the Savannah Press noticed some time ago the steel rails made in Pennsylvania cost the railroads of this country $28 a ton, and yet the same rails were delivered at Beirut for the Jerusalem and Joppa Short Line at $22 a ton. Or, if we deduct the freight, $5 a ton, the net charge abroad is a little over $17 a ton. American consumers are paying about $10 a ton more than the foreign purchaser for the same article. The harm done in this one item amounts in one year to a tax of nearly $30,000,000 to American enterprises.

And, according to the statistics which I have just read, in the year 1903, if Mr. Schwab's figures are correct, the people of the United States paid from $33,000,000 to $35,000,000 of bonus upon the consumption of steel rails in America over and above what Mr. Schwab said would be a satisfactory profit. Continuing, the article from the Savannah Press says:

Not only is this true of steel rails, but of ammunition caps the export price shows a difference of about 40 per cent in favor of the foreign consumer. Axle grease made in America is sold at $5.40 per dozen gallon cans and $4.50 abroad, making a difference of 20 per cent. Refixed borax sells at 2½ cents a pound abroad and 7½ cents at home, a difference of 2½ cents. Coffee and spice mills show a difference of 20 per cent in favor of foreign purchasers; harness snaps 25 per cent; meat choppers nearly 40 per cent. Nails sell at home at $2 per hundred pounds and abroad about $1.30, a difference of about 40 per cent in favor of the foreign purchaser.

One make of pianos brings $275 at home and $225 abroad. Playing cards, which sell at home for $25 a gross, can be bought for half the price abroad, a difference of about 100 per cent. Powder shows a descrimination of 30 per cent; rakes a difference of about 25 per cent; sausage stuffers a difference of 20 per cent; saws a difference of about 5 per cent. Sewing machines made in America cost from $20 to $25. The same machines when shipped abroad bring about from $13 to $17, a difference of about 50 per cent. Shovels show a difference of 30 per cent. Tin plates bring something over $4 a hundred pounds at home and about $3 a hundred pounds abroad. Remington typewriters bring $100 in this country; abroad you can buy Remington typewriters from $55 to $65. Barbed wire brings $2.90 a hundred pounds at home and $2.25 abroad. Wire rope shows a difference of over 200 per cent in favor of the foreign purchaser.

I want to read one other statement which I take from the Augusta Chronicle of December 14, in which the editor of that paper gives an instance within his personal knowledge, a small matter comparatively, but it illustrates the general proposition:

AFTER FACTS AND FIGURES.

If Senator BACON's resolution shall succeed in bringing before the people, in the strong and statistical way that the new Department of Commerce and Labor knows how to array figures, an accurate statement of the present Republican protective tariff, it will prove a very illuminating document. It will be remembered that we published in our dispatches from Washington a day or two ago that Senator BACON had introduced a resolution directing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to procure and transmit to the Senate information as to what classes of goods manufactured in the United States during the year ending December 31, 1903, have been sold or offered for sale in foreign countries by the manufacturers or agents at less than the same classes of goods were sold in the United States. This inquiry is to have special reference to manufacturers of iron and steel and other metals, or glass and crockery, textile goods, boots, shoes, hats, caps, and other wearing apparel, household and kitchen utensils and wares, sewing machines, vehicles of all kinds, farm implements and machinery of all kinds, jewelry, etc.

About a year ago the representative of a foreign government who has offices in New York spent a day or two in Augusta and conversed with the writer on this very subject, and cited the fact that he had saved about $50 on three typewriters which he wanted to buy in New York for use in his offices in that city by getting the representative of his government in London to import these American typewriters and ship them back to him at New York, where they entered free of duty, being of American manufacture—that is, the man in London could write to the New York dealer, and he would lay down the typewriters in London cheaper than he would sell them to a New York purchaser, not only cheaper, but so much cheaper that it was to the interest of this man in New York to go to the trouble of buying his three typewriters in this way. This, he assured me, was an actual occurrence.

It is a notorious fact that McCormick reapers and other agricultural implements are sold in Europe for less than an Illinois farmer can buy them at the factory in Chicago, and there is no doubt that Senator BACON'S resolution can develop some very interesting statistics if he can push it to a successful issue.

I have seen a statement in the public press—I can not vouch for its accuracy, but I had had information outside of that that the statement is correct—that when the barbed fence wire was taken into the trust the parties engaged in that business absolutely made 50 per cent a week profit, and that thereafter the profit settled down to 400 per cent per annum. I am fully prepared to see how that can be correct from the knowledge which I have, and which all of us who had any experience in the use of barbed wire have, knowing that it has increased in price, certainly considerably over 100 per cent, if not nearly 200 per cent, not very recently, but at the time when it was taken into the trust, and very soon thereafter.

I have a letter from an exporter in New York City, voluntarily written to me, in which he states that the price to him for barbed wire to be exported to South America is $2.20 per hundred pounds, while to the man in the United States the price of barbed wire is from $2.90 to $3 per hundred pounds. In other words, the farmer in South America can fence his fields with barbed wire made in the United States and sold to him in the United States at a less price than the farmer in the United States can buy barbed wire from the same man in the United States to fence his field with. Under the operation of the present tariff law the American farmer is compelled to pay to the barbed-wire manufacturers in the United States at least 40 per cent more than the South American farmer is required to pay when he buys exactly the same wire from the same man in the United States.

Mr. President, I find that I shall not be able to complete what I have to say this evening. I should have done so but for interruptions, of which I do not, however, complain; but owing to the special order fixed for half past 4 o'clock I know there would be a small fragment of my speech left over were I to attempt to conclude this evening. I should be very glad if the Senate would permit me to suspend at this point, and I promise, if that courtesy is allowed me, that I shall to-morrow endeavor to complete my remarks in a brief time. I do not think it will take as much time to do so then as if I should attempt to go on now.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator not wait until we can conclude the consideration of the last one of the appropriation bills in order that it may go to conference—the Military Academy bill?

Mr. BACON. I understand there is but one other appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Only one.

Mr. BACON. And the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has given notice that he will speak to-morrow morning. I shall endeavor, if I may have the indulgence of the Senate, to condense what I have to say into smaller space than I could do if I had to go on now.

Mr. WARREN. Of course I do not want—and it would seem ungracious in me if I should—to make any objection to the Senator going on in the morning, but would it not be better if we should consider this short appropriation bill and get it out of the way, so that it may be printed in the amended form and considered by the conference, if a conference be necessary?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly; but I will state to the Senator from Wyoming that I am speaking now only by courtesy of the Senate. I am not in a position to make any objection, and would not do so. The Senator might go on now, I would suggest to him.

Mr. WARREN. I am going on now, and wish to try to complete the consideration of the bill to-morrow immediately after routine morning business.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Texas has the floor in the morning.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not given any notice of an intention to address the Senate, and Senators need not take that into account. I shall seize such opportunity as may present itself to address the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to-day gave notice that to-morrow morning he would address the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I would simply ask the courtesy of the Senate to the extent that after the Military Academy bill has been finished I may be allowed to conclude.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. GALLINGER. Before that motion is put, I desire to say that it is my purpose, as well as my duty, at the earliest possible moment to move an executive session for the consideration of very important business.

Mr. TELLER. You can not do that now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to do it to-day.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to say that in asking the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill I desire to have it finished to-morrow morning immediately after the routine business. I want to suggest to my brother Senators that in reporting from committees their bills they shall desist, as far as possible, at least to-morrow morning, from asking that bills reported from committees shall be immediately considered and put upon final passage, instead of going to the Calendar. I say that in the conduct of good business. I am one of those who believe we should not finally adjourn until after we have an opportunity for the consideration of unobjected bills upon the Calendar. I am informed by several of those who have much to do with the conduct of the business of the Senate that there will be an opportunity for that. I want to ask that in the morning we shall proceed to the conclusion of this bill immediately after the close of the regular necessary routine business.

I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. ALGER. Before that motion is put, will the Senator kindly yield to me that I may ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, which I am sure will not lead to debate?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

STEAMER BEAUMONT.

Mr. ALGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4570) to provide an American register for the steamer Beaumont.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, at the end of line 8, on page 1, after the word "salvage," to insert "less the amount expended in payment of wages to foreign workingmen and in the employment of foreign tugs and for foreign material;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Mira, owned by a citizen of the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States, under the name of Beaumont, whenever it shall be shown to the Commissioner of Navigation that the repairs made in the United States, together with the salvage, less the amount expended in payment of wages to foreign workingmen and in the employment of foreign tugs and for foreign material, have amounted to three times the price paid for the wreck (exclusive of salvage) to her foreign owners.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. In connection with that bill I should like to have the views of the minority of the Committee on Commerce published.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the RECORD?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority of the committee will be printed in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The views of the minority of the Committee on Commerce, submitted by Mr. FRYE April 11, 1904, are as follows:

Following are the views of the minority members of the Commerce Committee, and their reasons why this bill should not pass, and why American registry should not be granted to the British-built steamship Mira, now owned by Mr. F. W. Gilchrist, a citizen of the United States.

It appears that the steamship Mira was built in Great Britain for the purpose of carrying coal between the ports of the Dominion of Canada and the ports of the United States. During the first year of her existence and more than two years ago she was wrecked on the coast of Nova Scotia. From the evidence received by the committee it appears that the Mira was salved by one James Reid, of either Port Huron, Mich., or of Sarnia, Ontario, there being a dispute regarding his exact residence and citizenship.

This Mr. Reid, it appears, acted under a contract with the underwriters to whom the Mira had been abandoned by her owners, but it is regretted that a copy of this contract was not placed before the committee, as it would have authoritatively settled the doubts that have arisen as to its terms. It is claimed by the advocates of the bill that there was a flaw in Mr. Reid's contract, the existence of which created a doubt as to his being paid for salving the Mira, at which point Mr. Gilchrist stepped in and purchased the Mira for $101,000 where she then was, in the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia. This $101,000, it is explained, was made up of two items, to wit:

1. The sum of $50,000, representing the vessel's value as a wreck; and
2. The sum of $51,000 expended on her by the underwriters for salvage.

In a letter to Senator ALGER, Mr. Gilchrist says: "I wish to say at the outset that I became interested in this vessel, not through any desire for speculations, but in order to assist a worthy friend of mine from our State, Mr. James Reid, who is engaged in the salvage business."

The opponents of the bill assert that Mr. Gilchrist's purchase of the Mira was a pure speculation, and they quote from a letter written by a Mr. Samuel Holmes, a New York ship broker, to Representative LITTLEFIELD, a member of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, this statement:

"With the knowledge of the big repairs necessary to this vessel I interested Mr. Gilchrist, of Michigan, to go and look at her, with a view to purchase, as she would fulfill the American law written to protect the shipbuilder, the American wrecker, and the American tugboat owner. * * * Mr. Gilchrist, true to his Americanism, saw there was a profit in the ship if he could get her into an American port safely and purchase her, because it was common sense she would obtain an American register, as she would fulfill the American law in the details of American expenditure, which is regarded as the backbone of this law, and not distance in yards or miles, representing the locality of a wreck inside or outside of American waters."

It is a matter of dispute and doubt, so far as the members of the committee are concerned, as to how much of the $51,000 expended in salving the Mira was actually paid to American workingmen and in the employment of American tugs and the use of American material. The inclusion of the salvage as a part of the cost of repairs was made under the supposition that the work of the salvors was done by American workingmen, American appurtenances, and American tugs. It is unfortunate that there is nothing before the committee that sets these disputed questions at rest. And it is on account of these that the amendment is made in the bill requiring that in advance of the granting of American registry—

"It shall be shown to the Commissioner of Navigation that the repairs made in the United States, together with the salvage, so far only as it shall be proven to the satisfaction of said Commissioner to have been expended for payment of wages to American workingmen and in the employment of American tugs and for American material, have amounted to three times the price paid for the wreck (exclusive of salvage) to her foreign owners."

This matter of salvage assumes importance because it has been the custom, through a ruling made by the Solicitor-General of the Treasury Department in 1853, applicable to vessels wrecked in American waters and salved in accordance with the provisions of the law of 1852, to include as a part of the repairs the cost of salvage. This was, of course, under the assumption that the salving, occurring in American waters, would be done by American citizens, and, as it is the claim of the advocates of the bill that her owner has complied with the spirit of the law of 1852, it is required that he shall satisfactorily establish the fact that her salving was accomplished by American workingmen, American tugs, and American material.

It is these matters of dispute and of doubt that have not been set at rest by documentary proof, that should have been easily procurable by the advocates of this bill, which in part account for our opposition to its passage. Another matter of interest which was not settled to the entire satisfaction of the committee is whether or not it was possible to repair the Mira elsewhere than in the United States. If it is true that no docks were available in Canada, on which account it became necessary for her owners to bring her to the United States for repairs—that alone would enable them to recover the money expended in her purchase and salving—the matter takes on an intirely different aspect than it would if, by preference and possibly at greater cost, her owner had decided to repair her in the United States.

It appears that the steamship Mira cost, when new, $230,000, that her present owner has expended upon her, inclusive of purchase price, salvage, towage, repairs, and keep while idle, approximately $200,000, and at least one reputable American shipbuilder states that the "approximate price for a new ship" like the Mira, if built in the United States, "would be $350,000, depending upon the outfit and finish required."

A letter before the committee from a representative of the company that repaired the Mira states that the vessel is now "in a condition to go to sea without any more than nominal repairs being put upon her," whereas her owner states he expects to expend "more than $30,000 additional in labor and material in preparing the ship for sea." This creates a doubt that has not been definitely set at rest by any authoritative proof as to the extent that the sums already expended upon the Mira have or have not completed her necessary reconstruction.

That the granting of American registry to this vessel will largely increase her value is made quite clear. It is also made clear that the increased value of the vessel will rest upon her eligibility to engage in the coastwise trade. And this is so because the coastwise trade of the United States has since 1817 been reserved for American vessels, foreign vessels captured as prizes of war or forfeited for violation of the laws of the United States, and foreign vessels wrecked in American waters, purchased by American citizens, and repaired at an expense equal to three-fourths of their cost when so repaired. It is in the last-mentioned cases (of foreign vessels wrecked in American waters which was provided for in the act of December, 1852), that the foundation was laid for these appeals to Congress for special acts granting American registry to foreign vessels that have been wrecked in foreign waters, then purchased by American citizens, brought to the United States, and repaired.

The plea is advanced that the purpose of the law is to provide work for American shipyards, which would be employed in rebuilding wrecked vessels. The mere fact that the vessel was wrecked in foreign waters, it is claimed, if she were thereafter brought to the United States, purchased by an American citizen, and repaired in an American shipyard at a cost equal to three-fourths of her cost when repaired, should not disbar her from obtaining American registry. It is also claimed that this leads to an increase in the number of American shipowners, and thus is an advantage to the country. Considering that during the life of the act of 1852 has been witnessed the greatest decline in American shipping, and that our tonnage in the foreign trade to-day is 100,000 tons less than it was in 1810, its helpful effect upon American shipowning has been imperceptible.

It is almost invarinbly the case that when these foreign wrecks are brought to the United States it is only because there is no other place where the necessary repairs can be made. It is quite probable that the same number of foreign wrecks would be brought to the United States for needed repairs that are now brought here, even were it known that it would be impossible to secure American registry for them. Instead of Americans purchasing these vessels as a speculation, they would remain the property of their foreign owners, the underwriters, or the salvors. But American shipyards, American labor, and American materials would probably be employed to quite the same extent that they are now in such cases.

The question to be determined would be whether the vessel in her wrecked condition justified the risk and expense of taking her to the nearest point at which needed repairs could be made. In the case of vessels wrecked on both the east and the west coasts of the two continents of America, the United States happens to be the nearest and most available place in which a majority of the vessels so wrecked may be repaired, and the same is largely true of wrecks occurring in the Pacific. It is, in short, a question of geography, and not a question of patriotism, as to where these wrecks shall be repaired. We may be sure that if there was no advantage arising through the possession of an American register, carrying with it the privileges of the coastwise trade, foreign vessels repaired in the United States would not seek such registry.

At the present time American registry, per se, possesses little or no value to the owner of the vessel so registered. A register is issued to an American vessel when she is engaged in the trade between the United States and foreign countries, or in the trade between the east and the west coast of the United States, or in the trade between the United States and its insular dependencies. Foreign vessels are permitted to engage in the trade between the United States and foreign countries, so far as the laws of the United States apply, upon precisely the same terms as American vessels. It is conceded that the cost of operating a vessel under the American flag is greater than the cost of operating a vessel under a foreign flag, and this accounts in part for the small (about 9 per cent) proportion of our foreign trade that is carried in American vessels. It is manifest that no one possessing a foreign vessel would place her under American register, even if privileged to do so, merely to run her in the trade between the United States and foreign countries under existing conditions.

The advantage that a foreign vessel gains, therefore, in securing American registry is the privilege it carries of entering into the trade reserved for American vessels, and that admittedly is what is sought by those in whose personal interest bills of the Mira type are introduced in Congress. The trade that is reserved for American vessels is carried on by vessels costing much larger sums to build than they would cost if built abroad. Whenever, therefore, a foreign vessel is admitted to American registry and to the privileges of the trade reserved for American vessels, its value is correspondingly increased, while the value of the American vessels with which it competes is correspondingly reduced. This explains the motive back of the zeal displayed by those in whose personal interest these bills are introduced and pressed for passage. It is a plain question of dollars and cents, a mathematical question entirely, and in no sense a patriotic question.

There are yet to be considered the American vessel owners with whom it is proposed that these foreign-built vessels shall be brought into competition. These men have invested their money in vessels built in the United States and costing much more to build than foreign vessels cost, no doubt relying upon the good faith of Congress to retain the act of 1817, which reserves the trade between American ports for American vessels. So long as they stand alike in their opportunities to purchase vessels for our coastwise trade there is no injustice done to them, but when a less expensive foreign vessel is brought here and an American register is sought for her, then the investment by American citizens will be in danger of impairment, because it will be more difficult for the owners of American vessels to compete in our coastwise trade with the owners of more cheaply built foreign vessels. And therein lies the injustice of this proposed admission of the Mira to American register and the proposed admission of such foreign wrecks as venturesome or speculative American citizens may purchase with similar ends in view.

If the Mira had been wrecked in American waters, she would have been eligible for American registry without any action by Congress if there had been expended upon her three times the cost of the vessel as a wreck. In the first case the bid price of the vessel, together with the cost of repairs, would much more nearly approximate the cost of a new vessel than in the case of a vessel wrecked, as was the Mira, in foreign waters. There would be many more bidders for the vessel if she were wrecked in American than in foreign waters. This would tend to increase her value as a wreck. The higher price she would bring as a wreck in American waters would compel her owner to expend more in repairing her. Thus American workingmen would receive much more employment on a vessel wrecked in the United States than they would on one wrecked in foreign waters, even if both were repaired in the United States.

There are five bills now before Congress, of which the Mira bill is but one, where foreign-built vessels wrecked in foreign waters have been purchased by American citizens and repaired in American shipyards. While these bills are pending a palsy rests upon American shipyards. Americans contemplating the addition of new tonnage to their fleets will await the passage or defeat of this bill and of similar bills in order to ascertain if there is a chance for them to secure a better bargain by purchasing a repaired foreign-built wreck than is possible through the construction of a new vessel in an American shipyard. The passage of this bill, and the other four similar measures now pending, would have a very hurtful effect upon both American shipbuilders and American shipowners. It would decrease just so much the amount of new work that they would secure.

This probably accounts for American maritime interests, and other interests allied therewith, representing invested American capital approximating $175,000,000, being of record before our committee in protest against this proposed admission of foreign-built wrecks to American registry.

In the domestic trade of the United States there is just so much carrying to be done. American vessels sufficient to do all of the carrying will offer, unless foreign vessels are admitted to the trade. If there is no increase in the amount of freight to be carried, then the competition of the newly admitted foreign-built vessels reduces the profits of every vessel with which she competes, and to the extent that she gets cargoes to carry that otherwise would have gone to the American-built vessels, to that extent the latter remain idle and their owners suffer loss of employment and of profits upon their investments.

If there is enough business in our coastwise trade for an additional vessel, then the admission of a foreign-built vessel will supply that need and an American shipyard and American workingmen will be denied the opportunity to build the needed vessels. In any event, the admission of a foreign-built vessel to American registry and to competition with vessels in our coastwise trade inflicts a serious injury upon both American vessel owners and American vessel builders.

If it be the judgment of Congress that foreign vessels should be admitted to American registry and to the domestic as well as to the foreign trade of the United States, then the act permitting such registry should be made general. It should not be a private bill in the interest of certain individuals or corporations. But not one of these applicants for American registry for their special vessels desires the enactment of a general free-ship bill, as they realize that if such a measure were passed the very advantage they now seek for themselves exclusively would be extended to all Americans generally. Hence it is that the passage of these bills does not advance the argument in favor of the general admission of foreign-built vessels to American registry. On the contrary, it increases the number of those whose interests will compel them to oppose such a general law.

Take the case of the Mira, for example: What has her present owner done that entitles him to receive American registry for the Mira? He went to Halifax, Nova Scotia, and looked at the vessel, then in dry dock. The work of salving her had all been done when he saw her. Whatever acts of heroism or unusual skill were shown in salving the Mira did not attach to him, as he in no wise participated in her salvage. The only question presented to his mind was whether by towing the ship to the United States and there repairing her he could get American registry for her. It was a pure speculation. With his money in his possession, and with a full knowledge that he was taking a risk that might result in loss, he chose to invest his money in the ship.

This sagacious gentleman speculated upon two things: (1) The chance of getting American registry for his vessel; (2) the sentiment that could be aroused over the unusual skill and courage shown by those who salved her. The glamour of the latter is thrown all over and around this case for the sole purpose of influencing Congress to grant American registry to the vessel.

What right has the present owner of the Mira to any credit for the salving of the vessel? Why should the incidents of her salvage influence any Member of Congress to give her present owner American registry for her? The vessel was salved by another person, with whom the present owner had no connection whatever up to the time the wreck was safely docked in Halifax.

The mere fact that Mr. Gilchrist purchassd the Mira after she was salved does not entitle him to any credit for her salvage. Were Mr. Reid, the wrecking expert who salved the Mira, to appear before Congress an American citizen and relate the circumstances of the salving of the ship, and able to present facts that were beyond question that through a flaw in his contract with the underwriters he was in danger of losing all that he had expended in salving the Mira, and his profits besides, unless he secured an American register for his ship, our compassion would be aroused.

But why should it be aroused for Mr. Gilchrist, the wealthy speculator, who balanced in his mind the chances of his securing a large profit if he ventured his money and secured an American register for the Mira? If Mr. Gilchrist was of such vital assistance to Mr. Reid in a time when the latter was financially embarrassed through his salving of the Mira, how is it that Mr. Reid fails to appear before the committees of Congress at the public hearings, arranged for many days in advance of their occurrence, and to support Mr. Gilchrist when the latter is embarrassed by the denials of his long-time friendship with Mr. Reid that are made by responsible parties? If a flaw existed in the contract that Reid made with the underwriters, by which his compensation for his arduous and daring work was likely to be lost, how is it that Mr. Reid does not furnish the committees of Congress with copies of that contract in order to vindicate the truthfulness of the man who saved him, at a critical time, from financial loss?

If Mr. Reid employed American material, American tugs, and American workingmen in salving the Mira, as is claimed and as is denied, how comes it that he is not before the committees of Congress to establish the fact beyond the possibility of doubt for the benefit of the friend who stood so loyally by him? If Mr. Reid is himself an American citizen and finds that statement denied before committees of Congress by those opposed to the granting of American registry to the vessel he salved, why, instead of sending an ambiguous telegram, is he not present in person and supported by undubitable proofs satisfactory to the committees of Congress upon this point?

Why should Mr. Gilchrist be given an American registry for the foreign-built steamship Mira, in whose salving he had no part, and American registry be denied to any other foreign-built vessel, repaired wreck or otherwise, that any other American chooses to buy as a gamble, or as a speculation, to be decided for or against him by the action of the Congress of the United States?

We see nothing in this bill entitling it to our favorable consideration. We should like to know beyond a doubt whether the Mira could possibly have been repaired elsewhere than in the United States; we should know beyond dispute whether the salvor of the vessel was an American citizen; the nationality of the men and the materials and the tugs employed in salving her should have been established to our entire satisfaction; there should not exist the present doubt as to whether or not the contract the salvor had with the underwriters had a flaw that impaired his chances of securing the payment to which he was entitled; it should not be left to conjecture as to whether the present owner of the Mira purchased her to help an old friend or as a bald speculation.

We believe that the passage of this bill will inflict injury upon American vessel owners and American vessel builders; we believe that the principle involved is pernicious and undeserving of encouragement; we believe that good will result from the defeat and that harm will result from the passage of this bill, and therefore we recommend that it do not pass.

RESURVEY OF TOWNSHIPS IN COLORADO.

Mr. TELLER. There is on the desk a Senate bill which has come from the House of Representatives with an amendment, which I should be glad to have the Chair lay before the Senate. It is purely a local bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2382) providing for the resurvey of certain townships in Routt and Rio Blanco counties, in the State of Colorado, which was, on page 2, line 12, to strike out all after the word "occupied" down to and including the word "appropriated," in line 17.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, which merely strikes out the appropriation.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to allow me to secure the consideration and passage of a short bill?

Mr. WARREN. For morning business I shall yield, but I do not think I ought to be asked to yield further to take up bills.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is not morning business, and I understand that the bill which has just been passed was not morning business.

Mr. WARREN. I am sorry, but if I should yield to the Senator I should be obliged to yield to half a dozen others whom I have already refused, and a great deal of time would be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is recognized.

Mr. WARREN. I now insist on my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13860, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13860) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes; which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the first formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs to be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I ask the Senator from Wyoming to yield to me, in order that I may secure the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9891) giving the consent of Congress to the removal of the restrictions on the sale of Puyallup allotted lands, and confirming and legalizing sales thereof since March 3, 1903.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has refused to yield to any other business than morning business.

Mr. WARREN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

For completing the work of improvement to provide for an increased water supply at the Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., provided for in the act of June 28, 1902, $300,000: Provided, That such sum shall not be available until the plans for the complete project shall be approved by the Secretary of War, and that the Secretary of War shall determine that the whole expense necessary to complete such project shall be included within the total appropriation of $400,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For completing the work of improvement to provide for an increased water supply at the Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., provided for in the act of June 28, 1902, to be available until expended, $300,000, to be expended by contract or otherwise as the Secretary of War may deem most economical and advantageous: Provided, That such sum shall not be available until the project shall be approved by the Secretary of War, and until the Secretary of War shall determine that the whole expense necessary to complete such project shall be included within the total appropriation of $400,000.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I first want to compliment the reading clerk on his great expedition in reading this bill—twenty-eight pages of it in less than nine minutes. I have had difficulty in following it; but still we have reached this point, and I should like to know from the Senator in charge of the bill the reason for the radical change in the House provision relating to the supply of water for West Point.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think the Senator from Maryland will find the change radical if he will look at both provisions and compare them. There is very much of the clause stricken out embraced in the one inserted. The amount of money is the same. The project upon which it is to be expended is the same. The idea is to make the appropriation immediately available. The change is made to permit the work to be entered upon as soon as the entire project is approved of as to the plans. The change is a matter of words more than a matter of substance.

Mr. GORMAN. I refer especially to the provision in regard to the supply of water for the Military Academy. As I understand, the paragraph inserted by the House provides for completing the work of increasing the water supply at West Point. The House provision appropriates the sum of $300,000, which shall not be available until the plans and project shall have been approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. WARREN. That is included in both propositions.

Mr. GORMAN. The House paragraph provided also:

That the Secretary of War shall determine that the whole expense necessary to complete such project shall be included within the total appropriation of $400,000.

Mr. WARREN. One hundred thousand dollars has already been appropriated for this purpose in a prior appropriation bill.

Mr. GORMAN. As I understand, the Senate proposition is practically the same, except that it takes it out of the general law and puts it in the control of the Secretary of War to provide for the completion of this new water-supply system, either by contract or otherwise, as he may see proper.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. The House paragraph provided in a general way that the work should be constructed under the general law.

Mr. WARREN. The House made no provision, but left it so that the general law would control.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. A very large proportion of this work, as it seems to us, can be done by the force that they already have and by some slight addition thereto. It may be more economical, possibly, and the work better done by leaving it in the manner that we do, so that the Secretary of War may have some discretion.

I will say on the general subject that the water supply at West Point has been a very vexatious question. There have been several ponds or lakes under consideration, but during the last year it has been discovered that a large body of water can be secured that gives—it is estimated—about sixteen times as much water as could be had through any other project proposed heretofore. The water to be secured is farther away, so that the ditch work and piping is longer, but the first cost of the pond, of the land itself, and finally of the whole work completed would be less than under any of the other projects. So, with the present proposition, we get about sixteen times the amount of water at less money than under the old project.

The only reason for permitting this work to be done under contract or otherwise, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, is that some portions of it, especially the digging and covering of trenches and laying of the piping, can be done by men already employed rather than to let contracts, and the work can in that way be better and more cheaply done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 29, after line 8, to strike out:

In carrying out the provisions of the said act of June 28, 1902, after general plans have been prepared and approved by the Secretary of War, he may proceed with the necessary enlargement of cadet barracks, upon detailed plans approved by him before the completion of detailed plans for the whole work, provided that the limit of cost is not increased thereby.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

In carrying out the provisions of said act of June 28, 1902, after general plans have been prepared and approved by the Secretary of War, he may proceed with the construction of such buildings as are most immediately necessary, upon detailed plans approved by him before the completion of detailed plans for the whole work, provided that the limit of cost is not increased thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 24, to increase the total appropriation for buildings and grounds at the Military Academy from $363,585.34 to $364,085.34.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 30, to insert:

That sections 18 and 23 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," approved February 2, 1901, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That hereafter the Medical Department of the United States Army shall consist of 1 surgeon-general, with the rank of brigadier-general; 16 assistant surgeons-general, with the rank of colonel; 24 deputy surgeons-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; 110 surgeons, with the rank of major, and 300 assistant surgeons, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted, and after three years' service from the date of commission, the rank, pay, and allowances of captain, mounted; and the Hospital Corps, the nurse corps, and dental surgeons as now authorized by law: Provided, That promotions in the Medical Corps to fill vacancies in the several grades created or caused by this section, or hereafter occurring, shall be made according to seniority, but all such promotions and all appointments to the grade of first lieutenant in said corps shall be subject to such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent therewith are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 23. That the Ordnance Department shall consist of one Chief of Ordnance, with the rank of brigadier-general; six colonels, nine lieutenant-colonels, nineteen majors, twenty-five captains, twenty-five first lieutenants, and the enlisted men, including ordnance sergeants, as now authorized by law. The vacancies thus caused or created shall, as far as possible, be filled by promotion according to seniority, as now prescribed by law, except that the Chief of Ordnance shall be selected from the permanent officers of the corps for a period of four years.

"That the vacancies occurring in the grades of captain and first lieutenant of ordnance shall be filled by detail from the Army at large, from the same grade or the grade below for four years, after which no officer shall again be eligible for detail until he has served one year out of the Department: Provided, That officers shall be so detailed subject to such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and the vacancies thus created shall be filled as now provided for by law. That vacancies occurring in the grade of major of ordnance, after promotion, as now prescribed by law, of all permanent officers now in the Ordnance Department, shall be filled by the appointment of officers of the grade next below, who shall have served by detail in the Ordnance Department, the selection to be made as the result of an examination, approved by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HALE. I raise the point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what amendment does the Senator desire to make the point of order?

Mr. HALE. The amendment on page 30, relative to the Medical and Ordnance Corps of the Army.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Maine delay asking for a ruling upon the point of order until some explanation has been offered?

Mr. HALE. I will state my point of order, though I do not suppose I need even to state it, because in its terms the amendment is an act of general legislation. Originally, in the Revised Statutes, under the head of "The Army"—a part of the Revised Statutes, the general laws of the land—what the organization of the Medical Corps shall be is prescribed in terms. That was a part of the existing law until the act of February 2, 1901, which in terms—that, too, being a measure of general legislation—declared what should be the Medical Department as found in that general statute, and also what should constitute the Ordnance Department.

I do not think that I need to argue the question. It is stated in the preface to these amendments concerning these two corps of the Army that the sections of the act of February 2, 1901, which are general legislation, embodied in the United States Statutes, are thereby changed. I make the point of order that the amendment proposes general legislation.

I do not say anything about the remarkable proceeding of putting provisions of this kind on the West Point appropriation bill. I have never known anything of that kind to be done before.

The Military Academy appropriation bill has always been a small one, relating to the subjects-matter that pertain to the administration of the United States Military Academy. It has been a small appropriation, and now upon this bill are put subjects-matter having nothing whatever to do with the bill. But I rest the point of order on the ground that the amendment is general legislation.

Mr. WARREN. I do not suppose the Senator from Maine and I would differ as to the statute to which he refers. We shall perhaps differ upon some other propositions.

If he will look at previous West Point appropriation bills, he will find in them what he has termed "general legislation," just the same as about every other appropriation bill we have passed at this session has carried general legislation. It has been my duty in making research of the statutes, preparing indices, etc., to go back through the regular appropriation acts, not alone referring to this subject, but to other subjects and conditions, and I find that for many years a large percentage of the legislation that is applicable from day to day to the business of the country, and which is referred to oftenest, was carried on the different appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. There has been a great deal of legislation upon appropriation bills that has passed nem. con., nobody objecting to it. Some of it has been good and some has not been so good; but whenever a point of order has been raised upon a clear proposition of general legislation, it has always gone out.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, as there are only a few moments before the special order is reached, I would suggest that the ruling on the point of order may be deferred until the bill is taken up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear what the Senator from Wyoming has to say in relation to the point of order either now or to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say that I think there are reasons which the Senator from Maine may consider sufficient to induce him to withdraw the point of order because of the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. HALE. It is a very remarkable thing, Mr. President. This is the expiration of a long session of Congress. There has been a military appropriation bill, which deals with the Army and the corps of the Army, with all opportunity for a general bill. This proposition has never been embodied in any bill; and for the Senator now, in the waning hours of the session, to ask me to withdraw a point of order because this legislation reorganizing two corps of the Army, which are fixed by general legislation, is necessary, although it is put upon this little appropriation bill, seems to me rather a remarkable request.

I can not, of course, withdraw the point of order, because I deprecate this growing tendency of incorporating upon general appropriation bills matters that have nothing whatever to do with the bills themselves or their substance. I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I can hardly grant that they do not have reference to this bill. So far as the portion of the amendment which refers to the Ordnance Department is concerned, we find it is difficult, if not impossible, to get proper ordnance officers for instruction duty at the Military Academy on account of the condition of that corps.

I may say to the Senator, so far as the question of expense is concerned, that the first proposition in this amendment is to save a large sum of money every year for at least the first three or four years; and that, at most, even after the five years, at which time the system is to be entirely in working order, the expenses can not exceed between forty and fifty thousand dollars more per annum than under the present condition; so that the amendment is in the interest of economy.

Now, as a matter of time. We have considered these subjects. The Senator will recall that we have had a change in the office of the Secretary of War, a change in the office of Lieutenant-General, and a number of changes in the chief and other high officials of the staff.

It has been the opinion of the military committee having these matters in charge that it was best not only to have the judgment—which was in favor of this legislation—of the outgoing officers, but after the incoming officers had sufficiently examined the subject that we might also have their recommendations and indorsements as to the necessity for this legislation, how far it should go. All this has caused delay.

As to the Medical Corps, conditions are such that it is rapidly being depleted for the reason that there are not sufficient inducements offered, as compared with those in civil life or in army service in other countries, or as compared with the Navy of this country, to induce physicians to enter or remain in service. The consequence is that we are now employing 195 contract surgeons, and we have appropriated for next year, in a bill which has already passed this Congress, for 250 such surgeons. I presume the Senator will accept my statement that it is a bad condition of affairs when our Medical Corps is made up largely of contract surgeons, here to-day and there to-morrow, neither educated especially for army duties nor with the experience and authority that they should have to be in charge of hospitals, of accounts, of property, and things of that sort. In the Ordnance Corps matters are still worse.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator will bring in a general bill covering the subject.

Mr. WARREN. That has already been done.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but we should enact a general law.

Mr. WARREN. And that will not be done because of the haste of the Senator from Maine and others to close the session.

Mr. HALE. I am not any more in favor of closing the session than other Senators. The session will not be closed unless a majority of the Senate want it closed.

Suppose that I and a few others were hurrying up adjournment, I and a few others can not adjourn the Senate unless the Senate itself wants to adjourn. There is a general feeling in favor of an adjournment. That is indicated by Senators upon both sides. One reason why careful, conservative men want the Senate adjourned is that they do not believe much good will come out of continuing longer, and that, instead of decreased appropriations, the appropriations will be increased with every week that we sit here.

I wish to state that the same projects for reorganizing the different corps of the Navy, named before the Committee on Naval Affairs, were urged as very important, but the Naval Committee said that is not a subject-matter for an appropriation bill. They are all fixed by the law as we established it five years ago, and whenever that subject is brought before the committee we will take it up and report a general measure of legislation touching the corps of the Navy and ask to have it put through, just as we did the personnel bill five or six years ago.

Mr. MCCREARY. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine a question. Did he make a point of order against that part of the bill which proposes to establish four permanent camp grounds for the instruction and maneuvering of troops of the Regular Army and National Guard? Did the Senator's point of order embrace that part of the bill?

Mr. HALE. I am making a point of order now on this provision for the reorganization of the Ordnance and Medical Board. I presume a point of order will be made by some Senator against that amendment.

Mr. McCREARY. The Senator's point of order did not reach what I refer to.

Mr. HALE. That we have not reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment has not been reached.

Mr. McCREARY. There will be a point of order made against that part of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator from Maine in his general view as to final adjournment, but I must say that I am one of those who will object to adjournment until after a few hours can be given to the consideration of bills covering unobjected cases on the Calendar.

I now ask that the bill with the pending matter may go over, and I shall undertake to call it up to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE THOMPSON.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, understanding that the bill has gone over, I call attention to the notice I gave this morning that I would at this hour call up the resolutions of the House of Representatives commemorative of the life and career of the late Hon. CHARLES W. THOMPSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 24, 1904.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. CHARLES W. THOMPSON, late a Member of this House from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. CHARLES W. THOMPSON, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his able and faithful public services the Senate, at the conclusion of these exercises, will stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the Secretary send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the resolution of the House of Representatives, in which the Senate is asked to concur, will convey to the people of Alabama a gratifying expression of the regret of Congress at the loss of their young Representative, who was esteemed as an honorable and useful man and was sincerely beloved by them. They will thank Congress for this expression of their sympathy for the loss Alabama has sustained in the early death of CHARLES WINSTON THOMPSON. They will associate the honors bestowed on him in these obsequies with those that come with responsive grief from their own hearts, and they will cherish them as an honorable and sacred memorial.

Congress honors Mr. THOMPSON because he was a faithful public servant, and the people of Alabama honor him for that cause and because they loved him.

He was not peculiar among his fellows and associates for distinguished abilities and achievements, but his life was an example of manly worth and moral integrity that reflects honor upon his people and entitles him to their affectionate remembrance. He was a true example of their religious, social, and industrial life, and a representative of the convictions and principles they adopt as their guides in their participation in the affairs of State and National Government.

He attained to this representative character, which he won without the aid of favoring circumstances, by his strong traits of personal character, his own courageous spirit, and his upright manner of living.

The young people of the white race of the South at the period of his childhood had an environment of difficulties in all that surrounded them that has had no parallel in history. I mention this to illustrate his success in life, as being due to Mr. THOMPSON's strength of character and to the approval of the scrutinizing judgment of the people who knew his course of conduct and rewarded him with distinguished marks of their confidence.

Great numbers of the young men and women of the South have endured the same tests with like results, but not with like distinction in public affairs, for few have sought such opportunities; but they comprise constituencies that are not excelled for good sense, useful knowledge, and true excellence of character by any of the communities in this great Republic, which means by any in the world. At the time when this youth entered upon the work of his life the new era had supplanted the old and had nearly extinguished all that had been created and established by the labors of man in the South, until only the soil and the skeleton of civil government and the ashes of movable property remained.

The white people, unused to labor, and their former African slaves were brought into unequal competition in physical toil and endurance, and were rated as equal participants in the inheritance of civil power in the governments that were established alone by the white race. The real struggle of their children was for existence, and there was little hope that they could successfully aspire to the enjoyment of the honorable influence that their fathers had possessed.

This was a desperate outlook for boys and girls born in that era. Yet wonderful success has been accomplished by them, which is only the precursor of greater achievements, and an applauding world looks on with pleasure and seeks to know the cause of the triumphant restoration of the white race in the South that now seems to be assured. The first answer to the inquiry is that it is in the blood of the race; but the supreme answer is that the All-Wise Creator, having assigned to the white race the leadership in Christian civilization, has qualified his people thus chosen for the task with the power to overcome opposition, to remove obstructions from the path of duty, and to defy all forms of oppression and antagonism that may impede their progress.

These traits we call "virtues," and it is a true name for the fruits of a gift that is really divine.

In no place are these blessed fruits richer or more abundant than in the homes of the southern farmers. The matrons and the daughters who minister in these domestic sanctuaries keep the sacred fires of liberty and of pure and philanthropic affection forever aflame on their simple altars, whose incense ascends to heaven and pleads for truth, justice, sincerity, courage, charity, and peace. Their prayers are not without answer, and the whole country smiles under the benediction.

It was in such a household that CHARLES W. THOMPSON was born and reared.

The modest fortune of the family had vanished in the conflicts of civil war; but his heart did not fail him, and he did not shrink from toil. He put forth the strength and courage that have the simple name of "duty" in the ritual of the domestic fireside—first, duty to God, and then to the family, and then to the country—and he measured the whole meaning of that injunction, and fearlessly he took up his task.

There is one yet living who remembers how she almost despaired when her boy first bent his shoulders to the task whose burden she had borne through so many trials.

That one is his mother. But she also knows that he had help that came not from human hands, and that she had begged it from One who never closes His ear to a faithful mother's plea. In such homes, with such family surroundings, men are born and nurtured upon whom the State can always lean with confidence in peace or war, at the voting booth, in legislative assemblies, on the bench, or in the executive offices.

They are the men whose public official servants create and administer the laws by their authority, and their test of civic virtue has always been that obedience to law is the highest duty of citizenship, and that he who refuses to obey the laws is not fit to be intrusted with their enactment.

It is such a constituency that Mr. THOMPSON represented.

It has been my good fortune to represent that constituency, in part, for nearly thirty years in the Senate. In that time I have enjoyed the honor of a near association with those who are not inferior to the men of any assemblage in the world, and no honor could be greater than a kindly welcome by them. But, even in the Senate, I have not found any whose respect and approbation I value above that of this splendid constituency.

To have the approval of such people while living and their affectionate remembrance after death is the high reward that Mr. THOMPSON has earned by a modest, simple, and true life devoted to duty.

I need not recount the history of his youth and early manhood. It was uneventful, in the sense that it attracted little attention from those who attach small importance to a career that is not accentuated by unusual adventures or extraordinary success or failure.

The southern pine that finally lifts its plumes high above the hills and plains is not less grand because it is not conspicuous among the millions that surround it in the great forests. Mr. THOMPSON grew up among men like himself, and he felt that it was honor enough to be their equal and to enjoy their confidence and approbation.

In their service and with their encouragement it was natural that he should be proud of the public trusts they confided to his care, and that he should hereafter aspire to official station, in which he felt that he could render a service to the people which would draw him into closer relations to their domestic welfare than he would hold to them as their Representative in Congress.

Some incidents attending the week of the fatal illness of Mr. THOMPSON point to the plan of public life which he preferred and illustrate the strongest motives that controlled his conduct as a man in his social and political relations.

On the last Sabbath of his life he worshiped, in the morning and evening services, at the Mount Vernon Methodist Church in Washington, and was found to be violently ill with pneumonia on his return to his hotel at night. He suffered severely, but patiently. His thoughts were busy with the sudden change that was about to occur, as to which he had no doubt. He had no distressing fears of the presence of death in respect of his future being. He had no sudden preparation to make, for he had "cast an anchor within the veil" in early life, and he had no dread of shipwreck on the ocean of eternity.

He had cherished the desire to lead a life of usefulness and the aspiration that it might be a life of service to his State, as the great embodiment of the sovereignty of the people of Alabama, for whom he had profound reverence and the strongest sense of loyalty.

He had served the people faithfully, according to his opportunity, in the Congress of the United States, and had, in an unusual degree, gained the confidence and the admiration of the Representatives from other States and the high regard and esteem of his colleagues from Alabama.

Having a substantial fortune, which he had earned laboriously and honestly in useful business pursuits, he was not tempted by any mercenary motives to pursue a political career, but his success in Congress had been honorable and, doubtless, it incited him to further effort to become prominent and influential in the councils of the United States. But when he thought of the disappointment that his early death was about to bring to his most cherished earthly hopes and aspirations he spoke to his nurse about the chiefest of these, the one fond expectation that had its strongest hold upon his heart. He said, "I had hoped to live to become the governor of Alabama."

Turning from the hopes of prominence in the national service and putting aside its allurements, he followed the guidance of his sound judgment and true heart and found in their teachings that in his love of Alabama and in his devotion to the service of the State he would, in return, gain the warmer affections of a noble and generous people, and in their service he would find the reward that he coveted.

I am deeply gratified that in his last hours the heart of this young Alabamian turned to the sovereign State to which his first and highest allegiance was due with yearning for longer life, that he might labor more effectively in the service of our people. This is the instinct and the worthy ambition of every true son of Alabama.

Mr. THOMPSON was born in Macon County, Ala., December 30, 1860, where he resided during his life. In the forty years following the organization and establishment of State government in Alabama, Macon County was a center of the highest and best social influences, and it contributed powerful and noble men and women to the service of a true Christian civilization. Not many were very rich and none were very poor or even so deficient in the comforts of an independent living as to create a line of social distinction relating to the ownership of property.

Such a just and happy balance of social conditions always insures the contentment of the people and their development on the basis of personal merit. This social condition in the South has afforded room and sustentation for the growth of many of its noblest men and women.

The standard of merit and social distinction there has not been the possession of wealth or the inheritance of ancestral fame. It has been adjusted by personal worth and uprightness of character.

The county of Macon and the neighboring country was settled by enterprising immigrants from all of the old thirteen States, and their children are Americans in the best sense of that high calling. Mr. THOMPSON was born of a parentage that had no special claims to distinctions in talents or letters or in public service, and no property that had not been earned by honest industry, and no accomplishments that were not the simple but beautiful decorations of pure and virtuous lives, and no religion that could not have an altar in every respectable home and a controlling influence for good in every action and emotion.

The time of his birth was in the period of the great civil war. At its close he and all the children of the South who still had the spirit of their fathers and mothers had to look through the smoke of battle and conflagration to catch a glimpse of the star of hope that still shone dimly and with uncertain light on the dark horizon of the future. But that generation has not failed to heed its light or to follow its leading. "The resurrection and the life" are given to all men that die, but the children of the South were compelled to fight different and, in the sense of suffering, harder battles than their fathers had won or lost for the chance of a new life that would carry in its horoscope the future liberties and the prestige of the race to which they and their fathers belonged.

Mr. THOMPSON was of that great number and, as many thousands have done, he searched among the ruins for the material and the tools with which to rebuild wrecked fortunes and the places of habitation. Through dint of the blood and spirit they inherited, and through faith in God, whose service they love, they have surmounted almost the last obstacle to their restoration.

The deliverance of the South from the curse entailed upon us by the covetousness of people foreign to us, which for centuries has brooded over the fairest land in the world, will not be long delayed, and his comrades and contemporaries lament that he passed away without having witnessed the opening triumph of the movement in which he labored so earnestly.

His greatest honors will not be written on historical pages or on monuments dedicated to his memory. They live, and will continue to live, in the hearts of those who knew him best—his neighbors and associates.

He died in the Lenten season, on the 20th of March, 1904, when the Christian world contemplates suffering and death—the winter season of penitence, the season when faith looks forward to the springtime of a new life. He died in the budding season of hope, when, seeking a new life freed from the decay of the old life and the moldering cerements of the tomb, the souls of men begin to take courage and even to rejoice in the hope of life everlasting.

It was in the quickening power of this season that a daughter of Alabama perceived and declared, through the single sense of touch, which was the only means of communication with the outer world that was left to her, the truth of the divine promise of the resurrection and the new life, and gave her conception of the "Easter season" to the world.

Her exquisite delineation of immortality could not have been the result of teaching, but of inward thought. It is so clear that it demonstrates its truth. It is the inward thought of a pure soul that had no possible guide but that of her own conception of the truth that could lead her thoughts to its discovery through the processes of reasoning. It requires more than all the senses to comprehend a life after death, and Helen Keller had only the sense of touch, yet she comprehends this mystery. Her inspiration is the true work of faith, aside from revelation.

Helen Keller's knowledge of death is as certain as if she had seen others die, and her knowledge of the life to come is an act of faith no less convincing to her inward consciousness. This knowledge may not be an inspiration given to this wonderful girl. It is, however, an inward consciousness—an act of faith—that, in some form and at some time, convinces every sentient human being.

This young woman was born and nurtured in the circle I have described as being neither rich nor poor, nor great, nor yet unknown. Her kindred are among the pillars of society in Alabama—the heads of good families, of which the strength and distribution resembles that of the sturdy oaks of the forests of the South. It is only a fitting tribute to one who appreciated the grand and beautiful sermon of Helen Keller's life, and who revered her almost as if she was an angel of light, to quote from her "Spirit of Easter" these lines of thought expressed by her touch, that recall the tongues of pentecostal flame. They are words of appropriate farewell from Alabama to her worthy son:

> Belief in eternal life compels us to believe in good deeds and honest thoughts.
> The good man toils not for to-day, not for to-morrow alone, but because he knows that his labor shall survive long after his hand has fallen from the plow.
> The good man pours himself into the world and makes it new. He is among the blessed who win sight out of blindness, order out of chaos, and life out of death.

These thoughts, I believe, define the purpose of the life work of the worthy son of Alabama whose obsequies the Senate is now celebrating, and I quote them as a legend appropriate for his tomb.

Let the people of Alabama feel in this hour of sad reflection the safe assurance of restoration to their former dignity and power that must come and will come through the virtues and labors of their sons and daughters.

Let them read and understand their future in the light of these prophetic words of the beloved daughter, Helen Keller:

> Since the first Easter morning the soul of man has shone with unwasting light; for then he looked into the radiant face of the risen Christ and knew that God's universe shapes itself not to destruction, but to a yet more glorious genesis.
> Out of night He bringeth day and out of death life everlasting.

Alabama has passed the darkness of the night. "The bars of night are broken." "The bird is on the wing," and the breaking of the dawn heralds the returning sun that cheered our fathers in the days when they met dangers on the halfway ground and accepted distress as a sacrifice due to their convictions of duty.

I find pleasure and, I hope, profit to the young men of Alabama in stating the grounds—the basis on which the people of that State placed their sincere affection for CHARLES W. THOMPSON.

It was not that he was considered a "model man," in whose life and example there was no flaw or occasion for criticism. He did not so regard himself, nor did he believe or aspire to the hope in respect of which personal vanity so often misleads excellent young men—the hope of being able, without divine help, to fashion character into the full stature and perfect development of a model man.

He has left a good example, well established by a modest, sincere, useful, and honorable career.

He has done as much at 44 years of age to gain the confidence of his neighbors and the admiration and applause of the people of a great State as very able men of greater age have accomplished.

Measured by such a standard, which, after all, is very high, CHARLES W. THOMPSON must be ranked with the men to whom the people attribute greatness and goodness as their grateful reward for faithful public service. He was not conspicuous for the brilliancy of such intellectual powers as captivate audiences by special gifts of oratory, or for the wisdom of utterances that will become standards of thought for coming generations; but, better than this, he taught by his example and his words of good counsel through which his influence for good is a permanent and enduring work.

His life was a steady, reliable light, that did not flame out at times with extraordinary brightness, but, in its uniform glow, guided many into the better ways of life and the people in safe roads to prosperity. It was not a false light, that allured his associates into evil, but a true light that all could follow without respect to their condition in life.

Men who have reached the period of longevity and experience where the present is the point of retrospection and the future is admeasured by the past realize that a good life, though it may be brief, is the most precious gift that a man can bequeath to his successors.

The life of Mr. THOMPSON is such a gift to his associates and to his constituents, and, lamenting its early close, they cherish the value of his excellent work and feel that his loss is a public bereavement.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I have often reflected upon that limitation on our lives here which, notwithstanding the opportunities for personal acquaintance, narrows our opportunities for that intimate knowledge of other men which is essential to a just estimate of their character and of their services.

I count it one of the fortunate things of my public life here that I had the means in an unusual measure to learn of the ideals and achievements of the Member of the House of Representatives to whose memory we are now paying our tribute. I sought his acquaintance, because, upon meeting him by chance, I found in him the type of what appeared to me to be a very large and broad public service. I found that he was thinking and dealing with those questions that lie nearest to our national life.

He had been born, as I myself had been, in a Southern State, at the very time of the outbreak of the civil war, in the midst of which so many of the institutions of our people either perished or were so transformed as to be hardly recognizable; and I think by that circumstance I was drawn near to this man. I found him thinking and talking and working for a better understanding between the sections of our common country. He had not shared the passions of the period of civil strife, and as he came to manhood he recognized that the welfare of the Republic, North and South, required a more perfect unity in thought and in feeling.

So, among the first things to which he devoted himself on coming to the national capital was to contribute to that better understanding between his own people and the people of the North. He understood that the old questions were all gone, and that nothing remained to fortify the old prejudices except the want of knowledge which usually lies at the basis of all prejudice.

Among the first things he did as a Member of the House of Representatives was to invite his colleagues from other sections of the country to go with him upon a journey to his own home and partake of the hospitality of the community in the midst of which he had been reared. More than two score of his friends and acquaintances in both Houses of Congress went with him to Alabama, and the most beautiful thing about the man appeared to be the modest pride and dignity with which he took these strangers into the hearts and homes of the neighborhood in which he had lived all his life.

He was proud of the old State, proud of her people, proud of her progress, and anxious that others should know and appreciate them as he appreciated them.

I can imagine no better service that could be rendered to the people of the United States than a systematic effort to introduce every section of our country to every other section. I know of nothing that would more swiftly and more perfectly extinguish the prejudices and misunderstandings which may linger even for generations in a country with such scattered interests as ours.

He was not only anxious that the people of the North should know and appreciate the people of his own State, but he had special interest in bringing strangers from other sections of the country into contact with the really great and troublesome questions with which his people had to deal.

I have met no man, either in public or private life, who recognized more clearly that the great question with which the American people have to do in the next century is the question arising from the presence among us of 10,000,000 people once slaves, now free men, and standing in the midst of a republic, looking for their opening and prospect in life.

We have had in the last few years a good deal of discussion, much of it helpful, but much of it, I regret to say, harmful, as to what to do with these 10,000,000 people. From an intimate acquaintance with Mr. THOMPSON, I believe he comprehended that problem more perfectly than any of his contemporaries, or at least his comprehension of it was so simple and so effective as to be intelligible to those with whom he expressed his views and opinions.

He was a believer in the education of the South. He had secured what intellectual training he had in the common schools and academies and business colleges of the community in which he was brought up. He began his career in early manhood as a teacher and as a superintendent of public instruction in the community in which he lived. He knew, and lost no opportunity to emphasize the fact, that the salvation of the community in which he lived and the salvation of the whole country lies in that form of education which qualifies the ignorant and illiterate for the larger responsibilities that belong to citizenship in the United States.

So he devoted himself in all those years to a study of the question of bringing to the black race in the South that kind of education which would enable them to master their situation, to acquire property, and attain a substantial relation to the business community. With the best interests of both races in his heart, he saw that the task before him was to prepare the black people for the everyday duties of life, so that at length they might come naturally to the exercise of those rights which can not be permanently withheld under our form of government.

His heart was enlisted in the cause of industrial education for the white people of the South because he saw what has been so graphically described by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], that the civil war left the South prostrate, its occupations suspended, and the savings of generations wasted.

But he did not confine his activities or his sympathies to the white race. He had a glimpse of the larger philosophy of this world which recognizes that there can not be permanently in a country like ours two levels of civilization; that ultimately there will be one level, and that the lowest. And so he bent himself to the task of lifting an outcast and backward race from the degradation in which the civil war left it, by means of such a training as would fit it for the active duties of life.

He gave his sympathy and counsel and his money to the great experiment which is going on in the town in which he lived which is intended to fit the leaders, at least, of the colored race in the South for that guidance of their people without which all their proper rights under our institutions are vain and insubstantial.

He not only gave that far-reaching enterprise his good will, but out of the abundance with which the Lord had prospered him he gave his money and his constant support.

I believe that he better than anybody else, certainly better than anybody whom I have come in contact with, comprehended his problem; and while others who have studied it with less sympathy and less insight have been prone to disparage the work to which he gave his countenance and assistance, the time is coming when the benign work in which the Tuskegee Institute is engaged will be recognized all over the United States as the real emancipation of a race, the final deliverance of a people.

It has been a good many years since I have cherished even a passing animosity left over from the period of the civil war. It has been a good many years since I have felt in my heart any unkindness toward the people of the South. I recognize the fact that while the problem is not altogether theirs, but a problem of our whole civilization, the work of solving it in the nature of the case must be largely theirs. I take this opportunity of paying my tribute to Representative THOMPSON as the foremost man of the South in his leadership in the right direction where the interest of the negro race is involved.

His public service was brief, I think all too brief for his fame and for the fruition of the plans which he had in contemplation for the good of his people. They loved him and trusted him as few public men have been loved and trusted by any constituency. It was the unanimous testimony of those who went down to his home to stand with his neighbors by his grave that in all their experience they had never attended a funeral ceremony in which the hearts of all were touched by an affliction so evident and so grievous.

He was a man of wealth, a successful merchant, banker, and planter in that old community in which his ancestors had lived. Yet about his grave gathered the poor, the humble, black as well as white, and the universal sorrow of all attested the hold which his life had given him upon the affections of his people.

Such a career, even if it be brief, even if its conspicuous service be for only a few months, has no real ending in this world. Its final account can not be rendered until the good influences which he set on foot shall have fulfilled their errand, until the works of philanthropy and charity to which he gave his sympathy and his support have finished their ministry among the people whom they were intended to help. While his public life was cut short by death, the usefulness of the man has no end in this world, though his reward, as the reward of all faithful living, has come after the brief labors and trials of this strange life are over.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, Mr. THOMPSON was serving his second term in Congress at the time of his death. While I had met him in a casual way during his first term, I never knew him until the beginning of this session, when he came to live in the hotel where I have boarded for a number of years. During the entire winter I came in daily contact with him. We had frequent conversations on various subjects. There was scarcely a day passed in which I did not learn to know him better and to have a higher regard and a greater respect each day as the relations continued.

I think because I was a native of the State in which he lived we were thrown together more frequently, with a few exceptions, than I have been with any Member who does not live in my own State. As I learned to know him he impressed me as being earnest, kindly, considerate of the feelings of every human being with whom he came in contact, as a man who sought to contribute to the happiness of all those who surrounded him.

I learned in the conversations I had with him that his whole mind was devoted to the building up of the Southern States, and especially of the State of Alabama. He belonged to that progressive school which sought to bring immigration from every quarter, who earnestly sought to develop every resource within the great State in which he lived; and, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has just said, one of the great purposes he had in life was to bring about a more kindly feeling among all sections of the Union.

It may be that his mind did not so often revert and he did not so often speak of the suffering days of the past as some others who participated in that great strife, and yet I learned from him that whatever was honorable and whatever was glorious in the record of his State, either in peace or in war, was a source of pride and gratification to him; and he often spoke of the great men who had represented Alabama in this and the other House. But that which impressed me most about him was his universally kindly disposition, his high moral character, and his constant habit of trying to contribute to the happiness and to the good feeling which might exist between those with whom he came in contact.

It was a great shock to those of us living in that hotel when on that Sabbath evening the word went forth that CHARLEY THOMPSON was dying. We could scarcely realize that the man with whom we had come in daily contact for so many months, whom we had seen on the previous Sabbath as he attended church, and whom we had met in the parlor in the evening after his return—that in one short week, on the following Sabbath, his life was passing away.

When his friends were gathered about him on that Sunday evening; when his youngest boy, a mere lad, stood weeping by the bedside; and when the father had passed away, there came from the youth heartbroken sobs, and he asked the question: "Why has my father died?" The thought came to me that the same question for ages past has been asked, and asked in vain. The widowed wife, the devoted mother, the loving daughter, the faithful son, had often, as they stood at the deathbed of a loved one, asked: "Why has he died?" But no answer has ever come.

We only know that sooner or later death will come to us all, but where and when and why none can tell. There is no answer to the question. But if a man has so lived that he has faithfully discharged all his duties, he leaves to his children the inheritance of a good name, which far surpasses all the accumulated wealth of this world.

As the years go on, and those two boys who are left behind remember the high and lofty character of their father, the splendid life he lived, his freedom from all that was evil, and his attempt to promote all that was good, I think it will be a gratification to them to know that that father was honored and respected by every man who ever came in contact with him.

I think, too, Mr. President, it will be a comfort and consolation to them also to remember that in his dying hours, so long as his mind remained clear, his faith never faltered, his hope was never shaken, but that he believed in his death, as he believed in his life, in the truths of the Christian religion which he had learned from his mother and which he had taught to the two boys he left behind.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I was a Member of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-seventh Congress. It was my last service in that body. Mr. THOMPSON was first elected to that Congress, and I knew him only as one of the new Members. During my service in the House in the Congress in which he was a Member there was but little opportunity for him to show the qualities of statesmanship that he undoubtedly possessed. His relations with the Members, however, on both sides of the Chamber were such as to early make him one of the marked men among the new Members.

That he achieved a good standing is evidenced from the fact that in the committee assignments of the Fifty-eighth Congress Speaker CANNON placed him upon the important Committee of Banking and Currency.

Mr. THOMPSON had not yet reached his forty-fourth year when death claimed him. He had not yet reached the maturity of his intellectual powers, but his service in Congress had already given earnest of a very useful and distinguished public career.

Alabama has long been fortunate in the choice of her representatives in both branches of Congress. In the Senate, Senators MORGAN and PETTUS are both men not only of distinguished ability and ripe experience in the affairs of life as well as legislation, but men of great learning, who maintain the high character of the service in this Chamber which that great State has always exacted of her Senators.

The people in a number of the districts in that State have appreciated the advantages that come from long service of their Representatives and have been amply repaid by the distinguished ability and fidelity to them which has been shown by such Representatives as Messrs. BANKHEAD, CLAYTON, BURNETT, RICHARDSON, and UNDERWOOD. The long service that these men have had in the House of Representatives has given them favorable committee assignments and has enabled them to accomplish more for their districts and their State than could be accomplished by rotation in the membership of the House from that State regardless of the distinguished abilities that any new Member might possess.

The Members whom I have named have not only been loyal to their several districts, but have been keenly alive to the interests of Alabama and the entire Southland on all questions affecting that section, and have been thoroughly patriotic in their support of the General Government. Mr. THOMPSON gave promise of taking rank with these Members in the House on all questions of general legislation, and especially on all questions that affected his district and State.

His life and career illustrate the possibilities of American citizenship. He first saw the light of day on a plantation in Macon County, near Tuskegee, Ala. His childhood years were filled with incidents that are common to the life of the average American boy. He early developed an ambition to gain an education and to improve his condition in life. After acquiring all the education that could be secured in the common schools of the county in which he was born he went to Tuskegee and there attended the Park High School, studying many of the higher branches of education and qualifying himself for the work which fortune had destined him to undertake in after life.

He was successful in all of his undertakings. He was a large owner of real estate and took an earnest interest in improving the condition of farm life in Alabama. He was also a business man of rare ability, and at the time of his decease was the president of the bank at Tuskegee. Like most American citizens, he early took an interest in politics. The first political office that he ever held was that of county superintendent of education of Macon County, his native county. He was elected to this position when he was only 26 years of age and held it for two years, discharging his duties in a manner that was not only satisfactory to his constituency, but creditable to himself.

For the next ten years he devoted his attention to his plantations and to his business, in which he was eminently successful. When he again essayed to enter political life, it was to represent the twenty-sixth senatorial district in the senate of Alabama. His service there was of such a character that his constituency determined that he was a fit man to represent them in the National House of Representatives, and they accordingly, at the expiration of his term of service as State senator, elected him as a Member from the district in which he was born to the Fifty-seventh Congress.

No higher tribute could be paid to his worth than this. The people who thus honored him were many of them those who had known him from his earliest childhood, and who had noted his advancement from one position to another, and with satisfaction had marked the fact that with each succeeding honor that had been thrust upon him he had shown the qualities of heart and head that not only justified the confidence of his constituents, but gave promise of a splendid future.

He was taken away, Mr. President, at a time when he was most useful to his old neighbors, friends, and constituents, and at a time, too, to which he had confidently looked forward as enabling him to not only work out the dreams of his boyhood ambitions, but to render a service to his people and State that would be of an enduring character.

His death is not only an irreparable loss to his family and kindred, but one that will be long felt by the people of his district and State. In the strenuous life that he passed in carrying on his various business enterprises and mingling in politics as actively as he did, he did not forget the teaching of the Savior of Mankind and his obligation to his God. He exemplified in his life the teaching of the Christian religion, and died in the faith of the Methodist Church.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, the character and work of the dead Representative from Alabama have been portrayed to the Senate with more force and with more eloquent language than I can command.

I will only tell you of his burial at his home. I was one of the Senate committee sent to Alabama to attend the funeral ceremonies.

Our dead friend was born and reared in Tuskegee, in Macon County, Ala., where he lived at the time of his death.

Tuskegee is the county seat. It is a village in the east central part of the State, and it has long been the home of an educated, orderly, and honorable population. It has been the location of useful schools for many years.

The train conveying the body of Mr. THOMPSON and the official escort arrived at Tuskegee about 10 o'clock at night; and it was met at the depot by a great concourse of the people, white and black, ready to do all in their power to show their respect and affection for their dead friend. It was a solemn and sorrowing gathering of the whole population.

Next day the people from the county came from every part and in great numbers; and many came from other parts of the State to pay a last tribute to the dead.

The funeral services were conducted in the Methodist Church, of which our dead friend had long been a member.

Mr. THOMPSON was a prosperous business man, full of business energy and work, and he had the power and the disposition to do many acts of kindness to others. His manner was bright, cheerful, and gracious. So his work and his charity, though not ostentatious, became well known.

The poet has well said:

> The world, which credits what is done,
> Is cold to all that might have been.

Such a burial by that people could never come to any man unless they could say of him, "Well done, good and faithful man."

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 26, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXECUTORS OF MARTIN DOWLING.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, reported unanimously from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, reported from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4651) for the relief of James T. Barry and Richard Cushion, executors of the last will and testament of Martin Dowling, deceased.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to abate the inheritance tax assessed against James T. Barry and Richard Cushion, executors of the last will and testament of Martin Dowling, of Rye, N. Y., as to so much of said estate as shall be established to his satisfaction to have been given to and vested in charitable or other institutions by said James T. Barry and Richard Cushion which under the war-revenue act of June 13, 1898, as amended by the acts of March 2, 1901, and June 22, 1902, would have been exempt from inheritance tax had the property been bequeathed by Martin Dowling direct to said institutions; and the said Secretary is further authorized to proportionately abate any of said assessment from time to time within the period of two years after the passage of this act, upon satisfactory proof of the further gift by said James T. Barry and Richard Cushion of any portion of said estate to any institution or institutions so exempt from inheritance tax as aforesaid. So far as such tax shall be abated under the provisions of this act, no inheritance tax shall be collected by reason of the passing of the legal title of said property to the said James T. Barry and Richard Cushion, and the said executors shall be, and are hereby, relieved from the payment of any such tax which may have attached to said property by reason of the said act of June 13, 1898.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILBERT. I reserve the right of objection for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I can state the object of the bill in a little time, if the gentleman will give me his attention. The Rev. Martin Dowling, a Catholic priest, was about to die, and desired to give all his property to benevolent institutions of the Catholic Church. He lived at Rye, in the State of New York—not in my district, but in another district—and he called his brother priest to him and told him what he wanted, in the presence of witnesses. He told his brother priest the way he wanted it to go, but under the law of New York any will made giving direction of property to a benevolent institution is invalid unless made more than three months before the testator dies This man was about to die, so he made his desire known as to how this money should be disposed of, making a direct gift to his fellow-priest and made him the executor, and asked him to carry out his wishes in regard to benevolent institutions. A large part of the property has already been given up as he desired it to be done. This bill is simply to relieve the estate from the internal-revenue Spanish-war tax as to the actual amount that was given for benevolent purposes on satisfactory evidence presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, and is, of course, in accordance with our policy of exempting all of these benevolent institutions from that taxation.

Mr. GILBERT. I understand that this is from the Committee on Claims. Is that true?

The SPEAKER. No; it is from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PAYNE. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GILBERT. It seems to be a meritorious bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

A bill (H. R. 12382) authorizing the payment of the Choctaw and Chickasaw town-site fund, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the money now accumulated and which may be hereafter accumulated in the United States Treasury to the credit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, derived from the sale of town lots in the said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, shall be paid to the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes (freedmen excepted) in the manner following: That, beginning the 1st day of May, 1904, the said town-site money so accumulated shall be divided and paid to the Choctaws and Chickasaws (freedmen excepted), each member to receive an equal portion thereof.

That if the fund thus reserved, or any part of it, should not become payable by reason of the failure of the persons claiming citizenship to be enrolled or of their enrollment to be approved as herein provided, said reserved funds shall go back to the general town-site fund, to be divided and paid to the members of said tribes of approved enrollment as other town-site funds.

SEC. 3. That if any person whose name appears upon the rolls as herein provided shall have died subsequent to the 25th day of September, 1902, and before receiving his pro rata share of the accumulated town-site fund, the money to which such person would have been entitled if living shall be paid in his name to his legal representative.

SEC. 4. That following the payment to be made beginning the 1st day of May, 1904, as provided in this act, payments shall be made each year thereafter in like manner to the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of approved enrollment of the fund accumulated from the sale of town lots in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That the payment of the town-site fund shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as provided in section 19 of an act approved June 28, 1898, being "An act for the protection of the people of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes."

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, to deposit in the United States subtreasury at St. Louis, Mo., to the credit of the proper officer or person, to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior and charged with the duty of paying out the town-site fund as herein provided, the accumulated town-site funds belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations at that time on deposit in the United States Treasury, or a sufficient amount thereof to carry out the purposes of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. LITTLE. I will state to the gentleman from New York that the bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and is simply to carry out the treaty provisions made with these tribes, and pay them per capita this money.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

LAWS RELATING TO MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Territories I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3338.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3338) to amend and codify the laws relating to municipal corporations in the district of Alaska.

Be it enacted, etc., That any community in the district of Alaska having 300 or more permanent inhabitants may incorporate as a municipal corporation termed a "town" in the manner hereinafter provided. A petition praying for such incorporation shall first be presented to the judge of the United States district court presiding over the court in the judicial division in which the community seeking incorporation is located, which petition shall be signed by at least sixty male adults, bona fide residents of such community, and shall specify the boundaries and the number of inhabitants of the proposed corporation, and shall also specify the name by which it is to be known, and such other facts as may tend to show good grounds for such incorporation. The judge shall thereupon, by an order, fix the time and place for considering said petition, which time shall not be less than thirty days after the date of such order. A printed or typewritten copy of said order shall be posted in three of the most public places within the limits of the territory proposed to be incorporated at least thirty days prior to the time fixed for considering said petition.

At the time and place fixed for considering said petition the judge shall give a reasonable hearing to those who are in favor of and to those who are opposed to the same; and if he is satisfied that it is for the best interest and welfare of the community to be incorporated as a town he shall, by an order, so adjudge; and he may, by the order, change or modify the proposed boundaries. He shall also, by said order, designate the name and the boundaries of the corporation, and the time and place when and where an election shall be held to determine whether the people of the community desire to be incorporated; and he shall also, by said order, appoint three qualified voters to act as judges of such election. A printed or typewritten copy of said order shall be posted at three of the most public places within the limit of the proposed corporation at least thirty days prior to the day of election, and such posting shall be deemed a sufficient notice of such election.

SEC. 2. That every male person 21 years of age who is a citizen of the United States or has declared his intention to become such, and who has resided continuously one year next preceding the election in the district of Alaska, and six months next preceding the election within the limits of the proposed corporation, shall be qualified to vote at said or any subsequent municipal election. Said election shall be by printed or written ballot in the following form, to wit: "For incorporation of the town of (name of proposed corporation)," or "against incorporation of the town of (name of proposed corporation)."

The qualified electors of the community proposed to be incorporated may also at said election by a separate ballot choose a common council of seven members who shall be qualified electors of the community. The said judges of election shall before entering upon the duties of their office take an oath in writing to faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their trust, and they shall duly canvass and compile the vote cast and issue under their hands and seals a certificate in triplicate showing the number of votes cast in favor of incorporation and the number of votes cast against incorporation. One of said triplicate certificates, together with all the ballots cast and the oaths of the judges of elections, shall immediately be filed with the clerk of the district court in the division in which the community proposed to be incorporated is situate, another of said certificates shall be filed with the secretary of the district of Alaska, and the third of said certificates shall be filed with the commissioner of the precinct in which said community is located. If it shall appear from the said triplicate certificate of election filed with the clerk of the district court as aforesaid that two-thirds or more of the votes cast at said election were in favor of incorporation and that the provisions of law relating to incorporation have been substantially complied with then the district judge shall, by an order in writing entered in the records of the court, duly adjudge and declare that the community in which such election has been held is, and shall be deemed to be, a municipal corporation under the name of "The town of (here insert name) in the district of Alaska," and the same shall from thenceforth be deemed a municipal corporation possessed of the powers and privileges hereinafter prescribed, and such other powers as may be given by law.

SEC. 3. That the said judges of election shall also canvass the votes given at said election for members of the common council, and shall declare the seven candidates who have received the greatest number of votes for such office duly elected, and shall issue and deliver to them certificates of their election. In case the community in which said election has been held becomes incorporated as aforesaid, the members of the common council chosen as aforesaid, as well as the members of such council chosen at subsequent elections, shall, before entering upon the duties of their office, severally take an oath in writing to honestly and faithfully discharge the duties of their trust, which oaths shall be filed with the clerk of the town. An annual election shall be held each and every year, on the first Tuesday of April, in every incorporated town in the district of Alaska for the election of members of the common council. The members of the council chosen at the first election shall hold their office until the next annual election and until their successors are elected and qualified, and the members of the council chosen at subsequent elections shall hold their office for the term of one year and until their successors are elected and qualified.

SEC. 4. That the said common council shall have and exercise the following powers:

First. To adopt rules and by-laws for their proceedings, and to elect one of their number president of the council, who shall also be ex officio mayor of the town and who when chosen shall continue to hold the position of president and ex officio mayor during the term for which the council was elected, and who shall take care that the ordinances and resolves of the council be faithfully executed.

Second. To appoint a clerk, a treasurer, an assessor, a municipal magistrate, a municipal attorney, a chief of police, and such other officials or employees as may be necessary, but none of such officers or employees shall be appointed for a longer term than one year.

Third. To make suitable provision for municipal and other elections, and to appoint three judges and two clerks of election for each polling place in the town.

Fourth. To provide for the location, construction, and maintenance of the necessary streets, alleys, crossings, sidewalks, sewers, and wharves. If such street, alley, sidewalk, or sewer, or parts thereof, is located and constructed upon the petition of the owners of two-thirds in value of the property abutting upon and affected by such improvement, then two-thirds of the cost of the same may, in the discretion of the council, be collected by the assessment and levy of a tax against the abutting property, and such tax shall be a lien upon the same and may be collected as other real estate taxes are collected.

Fifth. To provide for the location and construction, for a limited distance and to a limited extent, of trails and wagon roads outside of the limits of the town, but leading to and from the same, where such roads and trails are necessary for promoting the welfare and prosperity of the town, but no money shall be expended for such purpose except upon the unanimous vote of the entire council unless the qualified voters of the town have at an annual election by ballot, by a two-thirds vote, voted in favor of such expenditure.

Sixth. To provide for fire protection, water supply, lights, wharfage, public health, and police protection, and the relief of the destitute and indigent.

Seventh. To assess, levy, and collect a poll tax of not less than $2 nor more than $4 per year on all male residents over 21 and under 50 years of age who are not active members, serving without pay, of a volunteer fire company in the town. Such tax shall be a lien upon and may be collected from any real or personal property of the person against whom the tax is levied except wearing apparel and household furniture less than $300 in value.

Eighth. To levy a tax of not more than $2 per year upon each dog against the person who keeps the same, and to provide for the impounding or killing of the dog in case the tax is not paid or in case the dog is vicious or dangerous to life or health.

Ninth. To assess, levy, and collect a general tax for school and municipal purposes, not to exceed 2 per cent of the assessed valuation, upon all real and personal property, and to declare the same a lien upon such property and to enforce the collection of such lien by foreclosure, levy, distress, and sale: Provided, however, That all property belonging to the municipality, all property used exclusively for religious, educational, and charitable purposes, and the household furniture of the head of a family or a householder not exceeding $200 in value, shall be exempt from such tax: Provided further, That the laws exempting certain property from levy and sale on execution shall not apply to said taxes or the collection of the same.

Tenth. To prohibit drunkenness, gambling, houses or places of ill-fame, disorderly conduct, or conduct endangering the public peace, public health, or public safety, to define such offenses, and to prescribe the punishment therefor, but such punishment shall not exceed in any case a fine of $100 or imprisonment in the municipal jail not exceeding ninety days, or both, in the discretion of the court, together with the costs of prosecution. The costs of such imprisonment shall be borne by the municipality and not by the United States. All fines and costs imposed and collected for violation of municipal ordinances shall belong to the municipality and be paid over to its treasurer. The municipal magistrate shall have jurisdiction of all actions for violation of municipal ordinances, and appeals shall lie from his judgments to the district court in the same manner as appeals from the judgments of ex officio justices of the peace.

Eleventh. To make due provision for the maintenance of a municipal jail and to provide the same with a keeper.

Twelfth. To establish one or more school districts, to provide the same with suitable schoolhouses, and to provide the necessary funds for the maintenance of schools, but such school districts and schools, when established, shall be under the supervision and control of a school board of three members, consisting of a director, a treasurer, and a clerk, to be elected annually by the vote of all adults who are citizens of the United States or who have declared their intention to become such and who are residents of the school district. The members of said board shall hold their office for the term of one year and until their successors are elected and qualified, and they shall each, before entering upon the duties of their office, take an oath, in writing, to honestly and faithfully discharge the duties of their trust. All money available for school purposes, except for the construction and equipment of schoolhouses and the acquisition of sites for the same, shall be transferred to the treasurer of said board, shall be expended under the direction of said board, and the treasurer of said board shall be the custodian of said money, and he shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, give his bond, with sufficient sureties, to the school district, in such sum as the common council may direct and subject to its approval, but not less than twice the amount that may come into his hands as treasurer, conditioned that he will honestly and faithfully disburse and account for all money that may come into his hands as such treasurer. The said board shall have the power to hire and employ the necessary teachers, to provide for heating and lighting the schoolhouse, and in general to do and perform everything necessary for the due maintenance of a proper school.

Thirteenth. To take such action by ordinance, resolution, or otherwise as may be necessary to protect and preserve the lives, the health, the safety, and the well-being of the people in the town and to publish all ordinances.

SEC. 5. That the common council may exercise their powers by ordinance or resolution, but no ordinance or resolution shall be valid unless adopted by a vote of four members of the council, at a meeting where not less than five members are present. The council shall have no authority to issue bonds or incur any bonded indebtedness, nor shall they have authority to incur a greater indebtedness or liability of any kind in any year than the current revenues of the municipality for that year.

SEC. 6. That the clerk appointed by the council shall attend its meetings, keep a full record of all its proceedings and of all disbursements of public money, and he shall also file and duly keep all the records and public papers of the town, and he shall to all intents and purposes be deemed to be the clerk and bookkeeper of the town and shall officiate as such.

The treasurer appointed by the council shall be the custodian of all the moneys of the town: Provided, That said treasurer shall pay over to the treasurer of the school district all moneys available for the maintenance of schools. He shall keep an itemized, full, and correct account of all moneys received and disbursed, and he shall pay out no money except upon an order signed by the ex officio mayor and countersigned by the clerk and specifying the object and purpose of the payment, and no such order shall be issued except upon vote of four members of the council at a meeting in which five members are present. He shall before entering upon the duties of his office give his bond to the town, with sufficient sureties to be approved by the council, in such sum as the council may direct, not less, however, than twice the amount of the public money that may come into his hands as treasurer during his term, which bond shall be conditioned that he will faithfully and honestly collect, keep, and disburse all the moneys belonging to the town, which bond shall be filed with and kept by the clerk of the town. The assessor appointed by the council shall once each year, at such time as the council may direct, duly list and assess all the taxable property of the town at its just and fair value. He shall file such list and assessment as soon as completed with the clerk of the town, and shall serve a notice of the filing of the same upon each person residing in the town whose property has been assessed. The council may review and revise the assessment, and may, upon proper evidence and conformable to justice, increase or diminish the same in individual cases, and when so revised and reviewed, and finally approved by the council, the same shall be deemed to be the true basis for the levy and assessment of taxes. The municipal attorney shall be the legal adviser of the council and the other town officials in reference to their official duties, and he shall represent the town as attorney in all civil and criminal prosecutions in which the town is interested.

All officers appointed by the council shall, before entering upon the duties of their office, severally take an oath, in writing, to honestly, faithfully, and impartially perform the duties of their office, which oath shall be filed with the clerk of the town. The council shall, at the beginning of the term of each officer appointed by them, by ordinance fix his compensation for the term, which compensation when so fixed shall be neither increased nor diminished during the term, nor shall said officers be entitled to receive, in any form or shape, any other or additional compensation. Any officer of the town, whether elective or appointive, may be removed from office for malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance in office, by the district court, in proceedings initiated upon the complaint of a taxpayer, and in which the officer complained of shall have full opportunity to appear and defend himself.

SEC. 7. That all license moneys collected by the clerk of the district court from any person for any business, trade, or occupation carried on within the limits of any incorporated town in the district of Alaska pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to define and punish crimes in the district of Alaska and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said district," approved March 3, 1899, and all acts or parts of acts amendatory thereof, shall by said clerk be paid over to the treasurer of such town, to be used for school and municipal purposes within the town. The clerk shall take a receipt for such money in triplicate, one of which receipts shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, one with the Attorney-General of the United States, and one shall be retained by the clerk.

SEC. 8. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are, to the extent of such inconsistency, hereby repealed; and the provisions of this act shall apply to and govern all municipal corporations heretofore created in the district of Alaska.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a brief explanation?

Mr. MADDOX. I will say, Mr. Speaker, if we had had order here, so we could have heard anything or known anything about what has been asked for I would not have objected; but I do not know anything about it, and nobody else could know, as they could not hear.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withhold his objection for a statement from the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There are some special reasons, I think, why this legislation should pass.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia withhold his objection?

Mr. MADDOX. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this sort of a bill should be considered at some other time rather than now. The committee may agree upon it entirely while some of us may have an objection to it, and, as I understand it, when these bills especially are asked for by unanimous consent the responsibility is upon every man in the House, and it is the duty of every man in the House to hear it, whether he wants to or not——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think it is right, but——

Mr. MADDOX. It is impossible to hear, and therefore I insist upon the objection.

CONTINUING RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 14754) entitled "An act providing for the restoration or maintenance of channels, or of river and harbor improvements, and for other purposes."

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the amendment to the bill H. R. 15054, the general deficiency bill, and request a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to cancel a bond given for the reexportation of some theatrical scenery, brought into this country under a bond, which was consumed in the great fire at the Iroquois Theater, Chicago.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

CONSTRUCTION OF SMELTER ON COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11586) to permit the construction of a smelter on the Colville Indian Reservation, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the Kellar and Indiana Consolidated Smelting Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, to construct a smelter in the immediate vicinity of the San Poil River, in the south half of the Colville Indian Reservation; that the smelter shall be located on the San Poil River, and that permission be granted to construct a flume from the site of the smelter to a point on the San Poil River where a water supply can be made available; that 6 acres of land be set aside for the site of the smelter, and a strip of land of sufficient width allowed for the erection and construction of the flume; that permission shall be given to the Kellar and Indiana Consolidated Smelting Company to purchase timber and stone necessary for the work of construction; that the Secretary of the Interior shall permit the work to be done under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and he shall also prescribe the prices the said Kellar and Indiana Consolidated Smelting Company shall pay for the land, the stone, and the timber used in the construction work.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 10, after the word "work," insert: "Provided, That the laws regulating intercourse with Indians shall be applicable to the lands set aside under this act so long as the south half of the Colville Reservation remains as an Indian reservation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the point of order, I would like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes the smelter company to purchase 6 acres of land upon which to build a smelter. The bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and a petition is filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, signed by every adult member of the tribe, asking for the passage of this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has it the approval of the committee?

Mr. CURTIS. It has the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the majority of the committee report it unanimously or all of the committee?

Mr. CURTIS. All of the committee. There was no vote against it at all. It is something that was asked for by the Indians and recommended by the Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tenneesee. Do the Indians ask that this smelter be erected?

Mr. CURTIS. No; they asked that the land be sold for the purpose of erecting a smelter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How are the Indians protected?

Mr. CURTIS. The Secretary of the Interior provides rules and regulations for the disposition of the land and for the sale of the timber and the stone.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, I understand that; but rules and regulations can be made and unmade before breakfast. I want to know what law protects the Indians against the invasions of this smelter company.

Mr. CURTIS. There is a proviso in the bill taking care of that, and if the laws are violated in any shape or form, the smelter company may be prosecuted in the United States courts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How does the law protect the Indians in that respect?

Mr. CURTIS. The United States district attorney shall prosecute in case any of the laws are violated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman to what extent this company will necessarily purchase timber and stone?

Mr. CURTIS. Just enough to build the smelter. The smelter company is simply permitted to buy enough timber and stone to erect the smelter.

Mr. FINLEY. After the smelter is erected, I understand that they will not need any more timber.

Mr. CURTIS. No more; and none is authorized—the sale of no more is authorized.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ISSUANCE OF LETTERS ROGATORY.

Mr. LEGARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11582) authorizing the issuance of letters rogatory by the Commissioner of Patents and providing for the execution of letters rogatory issued from foreign patent offices; which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 875 of the Revised Statutes is amended by adding thereto the following sentence: "The Commissioner of Patents may issue letters rogatory to take the testimony of any witness in a foreign country to be used in a cause pending in his Office;" so that the section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 875. When any commission or letter rogatory, issued to take the testimony of any witness in a foreign country in any suit in which the United States are parties or have an interest, is executed by the court or the commissioner to whom it is directed, it shall be returned by such court or commissioner to the minister or consul of the United States nearest the place where it is executed. On receiving the same, the said minister or consul shall indorse thereon a certificate, stating when and where the same was received, and that the said deposition is in the same condition as when he received it, and he shall thereupon transmit the said letter or commission so executed and certified, by mail, to the clerk of the court from which the same issued, in the manner in which his official dispatches are transmitted to the Government. And the testimony of witnesses so taken and returned shall be read as evidence on the trial of the suit in which it was taken, without objection as to the method of returning the same. [When letters rogatory are addressed from any court of a foreign country to any circuit court of the United States a commissioner of such circuit court designated by said court to make the examination of the witnesses mentioned in said letters shall have power to compel the witnesses to appear and depose in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in courts.] The Commissioner of Patents may issue letters rogatory to take the testimony of any witness in a foreign country to be used in a cause pending in his Office."

SEC. 2. That section 4071 of the Revised Statutes is amended by adding thereto the following sentence: "Letters rogatory issued from patent offices which possess and exercise judicial functions, of foreign powers which require and permit similar procedure within their respective territories, containing interrogatories addressed to a witness or witnesses residing within the United States, to be used in a cause pending in such foreign patent office, shall be required and permitted to be executed by a district judge of the district within which the witness resides or shall be found, in the same manner as in the case of letters rogatory issued from a foreign court;" so that the section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4071. The testimony of any witness residing within the United States, to be used in any suit for the recovery of money or property depending in any court in any foreign country with which the United States are at peace and in which the government of such foreign country shall be a party or shall have an interest, may be obtained to be used in such suit. If a commission or letters rogatory to take such testimony, together with specific written interrogatories accompanying the same and addressed to such witness, shall have been issued from the court in which such suit is pending, on producing the same before the district judge of any district where the witness resides or shall be found, and on due proof being made to such judge that the testimony of any witness is material to the party desiring the same, such judge shall issue a summons to such witness requiring him to appear before the officer or commissioner named in such commission or letters rogatory to testify in such suit. And no witness shall be compelled to appear or to testify under this section except for the purpose of answering such interrogatories so issued and accompanying such commission or letters: Provided, That when counsel for all the parties attend the examination they may consent that questions in addition to those accompanying the commission or letters rogatory may be put to the witness, unless the commission or letters rogatory exclude such additional interrogatories.

"The summons shall specify the time and place at which the witness is required to attend, which place shall be within 100 miles of the place where the witness resides or shall be served with such summons. Letters rogatory issued from patent offices which possess and exercise judicial functions, of foreign powers which require and permit similar procedure within their respective territories, containing interrogatories addressed to a witness or witnesses residing within the United States, to be used in a cause pending in such foreign patent office, shall be required and permitted to be executed by a district judge of the district within which the witness resides or shall be found, in the same manner as in the case of letters rogatory issued from a foreign court."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know from what committee this bill comes.

Mr. LEGARE. Mr. Speaker, it comes from the Committee on Patents, and has their unanimous indorsement.

Mr. CLAYTON. And has been considered by a full committee?

Mr. LEGARE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEGARE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF PORT OF ENTRY FROM SITKA, ALASKA, TO JUNEAU, ALASKA.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1925) providing for the removal of the port of entry in the customs collection district in Alaska from Sitka, Alaska, to Juneau, Alaska, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2592 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878, be amended by striking out the word "Sitka" in the last line of the section and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Juneau." The collector of customs for the customs collection district of Alaska shall reside at Juneau, which is hereby made and constituted the port of entry for said district instead of Sitka.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JESSE OVERSTREET,
J. J. GARDNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

BOIES PENROSE,
J. P. DOLLIVER,
A. S. CLAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

I concur in this report except as to Nos. 42 and 43.

JOHN A. MOON.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13521) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon in the accompanying conference report on each of the Senate amendments, namely:

The Senate made seventy-one amendments to the bill, involving an increase of $3,263,182.

By the action of the conferees, submitted in the accompanying report, the House recedes upon amendments involving an increase of $2,201,292. The Senate receded on amendments involving $1,061,890.

The bill as passed by the House carried $170,466,088.75.

As agreed to by conferees, the bill carries $172,667,380.75, of which sum $170,967,380.75 is chargeable to the postal revenues and $1,700,000 chargeable to the general fund.

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2: The effect of the action of the conferees is to leave the appropriations for compensation to substitutes and for temporary clerk hire in first and second class offices in separate items, in the same manner as the bill passed the House and as is now provided in current law.

Amendments Nos. 3, 4, and 5: The House appropriated $500,000 for unusual business at third and fourth class post-offices and $1,000,000 for separating service at those offices. The action of the Senate consolidated the items for separating service and unusual business, and allowed a sum therefor of $1,000,000. It also designated $500,000, by amendment No. 5, for clerical services in third-class offices. By the action of the conferees the sum of $50,000 is appropriated for unusual business at third and fourth class post-offices, $750,000 for separating service at those offices, and $700,000 for allowances to third-class post-offices, to be used for clerical service in conformity with a schedule which permits the allowance of not exceeding $200 to offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, and $1,200; not exceeding $300 to offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, and $1,500, and not exceeding $400 to offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600, $1,700, $1,800, and $1,900. The provisions which passed the House requiring the Postmaster-General to publish the rules or regulations governing the allotment of the various sums, and also requiring him to report to Congress prior to February 1, 1905, the method of application of the appropriations and the circumstances under which they have been disbursed, are retained.

Amendment No. 6: By the action of the conferees the House language permitting the lease of building in New York for a period of twenty-five years is retained. The amendment of the Senate would have reduced it to ten years.

Amendment No. 7: By the action of the conferees the amendment of the Senate No. 7, providing that the rental paid for post-office facilities in New York shall not exceed a certain percentage of the appraised value of the building occupied over the New York Central tracks, was stricken out.

Amendment No. 8: This amendment provided for the purchase of a post-office site in the city of New York from the Pennsylvania, New York and Long Island Railroad Company, and an appropriation therefor of $2,000,000. By the action of the conferees an agreement has been reached whereby an appropriation of $1,700,000 is made for the purchase in fee of such site, containing 100,000 square feet of area, the boundaries of the property being stated, and such limitations and conditions placed upon the disbursement of the money as, it is believed, will amply protect the Government, secure adequate quarters for post-office facilities at the point designated, and prevent the money paid from being charged to the postal revenues.

Amendment No. 9: The action of the conferees on this amendment struck out the provision permitting the acquisition of a site in the city of Washington for an addition to the Post-Office building.

Amendment No. 10: This amendment increased the amount appropriated for miscellaneous and incidental items directly connected with first and second class offices $25,000; and the House conferees agreed to the same.

Amendment No. 11: The action of the Senate on amendment No. 11 was to strike out the House provision relative to expenditures for telephone service in post-offices, and insert another provision in lieu thereof. By the action of the conferees both provisions are stricken out.

Amendments Nos. 12 and 13: The action of the conferees upon these amendments is to permit the rental or purchase of canceling machines, and strikes out of the paragraph the words "and motors and power therefor," leaving the appropriation $200,000. The money necessary for the purchase, installation, and repairs of motors and power therefor will be available from the necessary miscellaneous and incidental items directly connected with first and second class post-offices, as at present.

Amendments Nos. 14 and 15: By the action of the conferees upon these amendments the provisions of the current law permitting the employment of seven assistant superintendents of salary and allowance division, together with the per diem therefor, are continued.

Amendments Nos. 16 to 24, inclusive: These amendments transfer the free-delivery service from one portion of the bill to another. By the action of the conferees this service is retained in the bill in the manner in which it left the House, the Senate receding.

Amendment No. 25: This amendment of the Senate increases the amount appropriated for steamboat service on inland routes from $700,000 to $750,000. The increase is agreed to.

Amendment No. 26. This amendment adds a proviso to the paragraph authorizing the Postmaster-General, after trial, to establish, in his discretion, underground electric service in the city of Chicago, which proviso allows any money saved in the utilization of this means of transportation by the discontinuance of screen-wagon service to be made available to cover part of the cost of introducing the underground electric service.

Amendment No. 27: This amendment, in the form of a proviso, allows the Department to pay an amount, said to be in the neighborhood of $21,000, out of the appropriation for pneumatic-tube service, to fulfill the provisions of the existing contract for that service in the city of Boston. The limit allowed by law for expenditure for this service in any one year is fixed at $800,000. The Department advertised for bids for extensive service in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis. The lowest bids received from responsible parties, while within the limitation as to cost per mile, namely, $17,000, exceeded in the aggregate $800,000. The contracting parties now operating the service in Boston, having been awarded the contracts for the service in Chicago and St. Louis, were requested by the Department to reduce their bid to come within the limit allowed by law, and an agreement was made with them recognizing their contention that they were really entitled to the amount of their bid, and such agreement was made a part of their contract, subject to the approval of Congress. They are performing satisfactory service. Your conferees take the view that the Boston contractor is entitled to relief, and have agreed to the provision of the Senate in amended form, allowing the Department to pay the sum asked for by them.

Amendments Nos. 28 and 29: The action of the conferees upon these amendments is to permit the appropriation for mail bags, cord fasteners, etc., and for mail locks, keys, etc., to be available for incidental expenses pertaining to the two shops located in Washington making repairs to this equipment.

Amendment No. 30: By the action of the conferees on amendment No. 30 the amount available to pay freight on postal cards, stamped envelopes, stamped paper, mail equipment, and other supplies from the appropriation for railroad transportation is increased from $100,000 to $120,000.

Amendment No. 31: The effect of the action of the conferees upon this amendment is to strike out the House provision which prevented the railways using any railway mail cars that had been in service for a period of fifteen years or more.

Amendments Nos. 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40: The effect of the action of the conferees upon these amendments is to increase the number of railway mail clerks that may be employed during the fiscal year 1905 in the various grades by 254 men above the number allowed by the House and to provide for their compensation.

Amendment No. 41: The action of the conferees upon this amendment is to permit the Department to allow expenses to assistant superintendents Railway Mail Service in excess of that covered by their per diem allowance and to restrict the total of such expense for the twenty-eight officials involved to not over $5,000 during the year.

Amendments Nos. 42 and 43: The Senate inserted a provision in the item for foreign mail service appropriating $45,000 additional compensation to the Oceanic Steamship Company for carrying the mails between San Francisco and Tahiti. This provision was estimated for by the Department, but stricken out in the House. By the action of the conferees the appropriation is restored, the same as the current law.

Amendment No. 44: The effect of the action of the conferees upon this amendment is to increase the appropriation available for the manufacture of adhesive postage and special-delivery stamps by the amount of $22,000.

Amendments Nos. 45 and 46: The action of the conferees upon these amendments of the Senate is to leave the amount appropriated for the pay of agents and assistants to distribute stamps and stamped envelopes and the expenses of the agencies the same as passed by the House.

Amendments Nos. 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 53, and 54, inclusive: These amendments struck out certain paragraphs in the bill in the free-delivery service with a view of transferring that service to another part of the bill. By the action of the conferees this service is retained in the bill as it passed the House.

Amendment No. 52: The Senate increased the amount appropriated for the marine postal service at Detroit from $4,500 to $12,000, providing that a contract should be entered into for five years at that rate per annum. By the action of the conferees the amount appropriated for this service is made $4,500, the same as for the current year, and the House provision restored.

Amendment No. 55: By the action of the conferees, a proviso passed by the Senate is added after the paragraph appropriating for fees for special-delivery messages, which stipulates that nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or in any way modify section 161 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in its application to the Post-Office Department.

Amendments Nos. 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, and 61: The Senate increased the number of rural agents in the $1,500 grade ten, in the $1,400 grade ten, and in the $1,300 grade six. By the action of the conferees the number in the $1,500 grade is made eighteen, or three more than allowed by the House; in the $1,400 grade the number is made eighteen, or three more than contained in the House bill, and twenty-five in the $1,300 grade, six more than the number allowed by the House. Provision is also made by these amendments for compensation to these rural agents and their per diem. The additional sum appropriated by these amendments is $30,900.

Amendment No. 62: This amendment of the Senate increased the appropriation for incidental and necessary official expenses of division superintendents of the rural service, and rural agents, and livery hire, $10,000. The House conferees have agreed to the same.

Amendment No. 63: This amendment of the Senate authorized the Postmaster-General to take into consideration the condition of roads, etc., in the applications for establishment of rural routes and the fixing of salaries of carriers. By the action of the conferees the amendment is stricken out.

Amendment No. 64: This amendment of the Senate struck out the House provision relative to rural free-delivery carriers, that they could be permitted to carry merchandise for hire for and upon request of the patrons of their routes, and added additional matter giving certain privileges to newspapers, magazines, and periodicals with respect to receiving subscriptions therefor and delivery of same. By the action of the conferees the Senate provision is stricken out and the House language restored.

Amendment No. 65: The amendment of the Senate increased the salary of the purchasing agent for the Post-Office Department from $4,000 to $4,500 per annum. By the action of the conferees the salary of $4,000 is restored, the same as passed by the House.

Amendment No. 66: This amendment of the Senate legislates in a more or less minute manner with respect to the duties of the purchasing agent for the Post-Office Department. By the action of the conferees the majority of this legislation is agreed to, and that portion stricken out which authorized the purchasing agent to report direct to Congress.

Amendments Nos. 67 and 68: These amendments struck from the paragraph relative to allowances for per diem employees and officers of the Post-Office Department the words "and their headquarters." By the action of the conferees this language is restored and additional provision is inserted limiting the effect of the legislation in cases where post-office inspectors are temporarily located at any point for a period not exceeding twenty consecutive days.

Amendment No. 69: The Senate added a clause increasing the weight of first-class mail matter allowed under the franking privilege to Members of Congress to 4 ounces. This is agreed to.

Amendment No. 70 extended the free-registry privilege to the Librarian of Congress and was stricken out.

Amendment No. 71: This amendment provides that a postmaster shall reside within the delivery of his office or the town or city where the same is located. The clause was agreed to as inserted by the Senate.

JESSE OVERSTREET,
J. J. GARDNER,
JOHN A. MOON,
Conferees on the part of the House.

EXTENDING PRIVILEGES OF IMMEDIATE-TRANSPORTATION ACT TO PEORIA, ILL.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5369) to extend to Peoria, Ill., the privileges of the seventh section of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of merchandise without appraisement, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and are hereby, extended to Peoria, Ill., a port of delivery in the customs district of Indiana and Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what this bill is.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, the bill passed the Senate and came to the House and then was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. It now comes back with the unanimous report of that committee. The bill simply extends to the city of Peoria, Ill., which is already a port of delivery, the privileges given by section 7 of the act of June 10, 1880.

Those privileges are already given, in the act as originally passed, to some five or six other cities in the State of Illinois which are much smaller than Peoria and which are entitled to them a great deal less. The privileges are these: It permits the imported goods, when they come into the seaport of entry, to be transported to this port of delivery in bond and the real appraisement made there and the duties paid there, so as to give the importer at Peoria, Ill., an opportunity to raise a question regarding the correctness of the appraisement at the point of delivery where he resides.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This bill has passed the Senate?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes. It then went to the Committee on Ways and Means and now comes back with unanimous support from that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRAFF, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COAL CITY, ILL., A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12899) constituting Coal City, Grundy County, Ill., a port of delivery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Coal City, Grundy County, Ill., be, and hereby is, constituted a port of delivery in the customs collection district of Chicago, Cook County, Ill., and that the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise conferred by the seventh section of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to said port.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] whether this bill comes from the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. BOUTELL. It does, with a unanimous report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the bill create another port of entry?

Mr. BOUTELL. This is a subport.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the Ways and Means Committee, at this session of Congress, has taken any action to carry out the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that the number of ports of entry be reduced in order to cut down the cost of raising revenue?

Mr. PAYNE (to Mr. BOUTELL). May I answer that question?

Mr. BOUTELL. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. The measure to which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] refers was brought before our committee; and the chairman was asked to make some investigation, which he did at the Treasury Department, to find out the ports which we might abolish. The idea was to draw a general bill; but we could not get the information desired from the Treasury Department, and have not yet received it.

There is no bill on the subject before the committee, except one leaving this matter in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. We do not like that kind of legislation, but prefer to get at the bottom of the matter. I think a bill providing for this matter will be reported early next session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I understand from the gentleman from New York that this Congress is compelled to adjourn without some reform of this kind because the Administration of the Government refuses to give to Congress the information necessary to the framing of a bill to reduce, in this way, the cost of raising revenue.

Mr. PAYNE. This is the first time this question has come up. It is a very difficult matter to determine what ports ought to be abolished in the interest of the public service. This same thing occurred in the last session of the last Democratic Congress. It is not a new thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know it is not a new thing; and that is one reason why I think it requires action by the legislative branch of the Government. I merely asked my question to find out positively why this Congress is going to adjourn without following the recommendation made by the Secretary of the Treasury to take some legislative action for the reduction of the cost of raising the revenue.

Mr. PAYNE. Such a bill would necessarily cover several pages, referring possibly to every part of the United States, and from the examination I have been able to make I have not been able to draw a bill of that kind. I have asked the Treasury Department to do it, but it has not produced such a bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] promises some measure of this kind in the future and regrets that we have nothing of the sort to act upon at this term of Congress.

Mr. BOUTELL. I sincerely trust that Congress will not adjourn until it passes this bill. [Laughter.]

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3165) providing for second and additional homestead entries, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has heretofore made, or who may hereafter make, entry under the homestead laws, but who shall show to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that he was unable to perfect the entry on account of some unavoidable complication of his personal or business affairs, or on account of an honest mistake as to the character of the land; that he made a bona-fide effort to comply with the homestead law and that he did not relinquish his entry or abandon his claim for a consideration, shall be entitled to the benefit of the homestead laws as though such former entry had not been made.

SEC. 2. That any homestead settler who has heretofore entered, or may hereafter enter, less than one-quarter section of land may enter other and additional land lying contiguous to the original entry which shall not, with the land first entered and occupied, exceed in the aggregate 160 acres, without proof of residence upon and cultivation of the additional entry; and if final proof of settlement and cultivation has been made for the original entry when the additional entry is made, then the patent shall issue without further proof: Provided, That this section shall not apply to or for the benefit of any person who does not own and occupy the lands covered by the original entry: And provided, That if the original entry should fail for any reason prior to patent, or should appear to be illegal or fraudulent, the additional entry shall not be permitted, or, if having been initiated, shall be canceled.

SEC. 3. That commutation under the provisions of section 2301 of the Revised Statutes shall not be allowed of an entry made under this act.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 3 and 4, strike out "or who may hereafter make."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I wish to make an inquiry. So far as I could gather from the reading, this bill is a measure of relief for those who have vested interests in homestead lands, accruing, perhaps, after the original entry.

Mr. MARTIN. The bill simply gives to homesteaders who, for any cause other than their own fault, have lost their homesteads and not obtained title, an opportunity still to make a homestead entry. Legislation of this character has been passed by Congress periodically about every five or six years, applying simply to entries of a meritorious character theretofore made. This bill has been drafted by the Department for a similar purpose.

Mr. PAYNE. Does it apply only to those who have kept possession of the lands under their entry?

Mr. MARTIN. It applies to any homestead entryman who has made the first filing but has lost his right, whether he has been in possession or not—cases where the party has lost the land and is not able to obtain title.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose that some one else has subsequently made entry of the same land?

Mr. MARTIN. It would apply to that case.

Mr. PAYNE. Would it apply to the first man also?

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, no; it would not give entry to the man who already had one, whether he filed in the first instance or the second.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How long does it suspend the law?

Mr. MARTIN. It simply relates to entries made before the passage of this law. The bill as prepared by the Interior Department would apply to future entries also. Our committee considered it would be unwise to make a continuous law for fear it might be used improperly; and it is made to apply only to cases where the entries were made in good faith. We have simply made it apply to bona fide entries made prior to the passage of the act.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir; and it was considered by the full committee.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. In regard to the provision of the second section, I could not hear very clearly, and it seemed to me to be a provision for the entry of an additional quarter of a section as a homestead.

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir.

The second section only applies to cases where the homesteader in the first instance made settlement on less than a quarter of a section, and when any other land contiguous subsequently might become available to settlement he might take part of that, so as to make it with his original entry amount to 160 acres.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman mentioned that this periodical legislation took place about every five or six years. I wish to know if the second section, providing for an additional entry, is included in this periodical legislation or not?

Mr. MARTIN. It has sometimes been in the legislation and sometimes not. It has been quite often adopted by Congress.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman not think that would give the right of homestead to a large number of people to acquire the land there?

Mr. MARTIN. Not at all. It only applies to cases where the original homesteader had less than 160 acres in his original filing. It often happens that when a man files upon his land there are lands that he can not take, and he will take less than 160 acres.

Subsequently there may be some change made by which additional land which is adjacent would be opened to entry, and this only enables him to complete such an entry as he would be entitled to if there had been a sufficient amount of land available in the original instance.

Mr. FINLEY. He can only take lands that were not opened when he took his homestead?

Mr. MARTIN. That is it.

Mr. HERMANN. This does not require settlement on the additional land?

Mr. MARTIN. It requires that the settler be still on the land he originally settled on at the time of the taking of the other land.

Mr. HERMANN. That is only the case where the original settler is in possession of the original claim?

Mr. MARTIN. This merely changes the original entry, so as to give the entryman 160 acres in all.

Mr. HERMANN. I think that is perfectly fair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE DISTRICT OF OREGON.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3117.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 3117) to expedite business in the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon.

Be it enacted, etc., That in case of the absence of the United States district judge for the district of Oregon from said district, or of his disability, a circuit judge of the United States of the circuit to which such district belongs may hold the district court and perform the duties of the district judge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDOX. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear the gentleman explain the bill; and I hope that we can get order.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. What does the gentleman want to know?

Mr. MADDOX. I just want you to explain the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a Senate bill, and was reported favorably by the Senate committee. It simply allows the circuit judge in the district comprising Oregon to hold the court in place of the district judge when the district judge is absent. It is asked for by both the judges in letters which are printed in the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FORMATION OF MUNICIPALITIES IN ALASKA.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill S. 3338, to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] objected.

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported a short time ago?

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDOX. I ask the gentleman to explain one feature to the House.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I will state that this bill has passed the Senate. It is a bill of the Senate Committee on Territories which visited Alaska, and is intended to perfect a system for the formation of municipal corporations there. The method there now is very inadequate and incomplete.

This bill provides that in communities of 300 or more inhabitants, upon the petition of 60 of them to the courts of Alaska, a hearing may be had after due notice, and the court then determines whether it is advisable and best for the people of the community to have a municipal corporation organized, and if the court determines that it is it fixes the boundaries and issues an order for an election on the question whether such a corporation shall be formed. At the same time they are permitted to elect a city council of seven members, and other details are carried out.

The measure also provides for the election of a school board. It gives this municipal corporation and the school board the fund derived from the occupation tax within the limits of the corporation and gives them power to levy taxes not exceeding 2 per cent upon the taxable property within the municipalities for the purpose of building streets, sewers, waterworks, trails, or roads for a limited distance outside of the corporation. It is hedged around very well, in the opinion of the Committee on Territories, and is guarded very carefully to protect the rights of the people. This, in brief, is what the bill provides for. It is much more complete for the purpose of carrying out its terms and protecting the rights of the people than the law as it now stands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Just a moment, Mr. Speaker; I understand this bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Territories?

Mr. SPALDING. It is.

Mr. SULZER. And I also understand the people of Alaska are all in favor of this bill, and to some extent it gives them home rule for municipal government. I hope the bill will be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER. I understood my friend from New York to say the people of Alaska all favor the bill. Has there been any plebiscite of the people upon this bill? Has there been any vote upon this bill? How does anybody know that they favor it?

Mr. SPALDING. They held two conventions, and voted unanimously in those conventions in favor of it.

Mr. BAKER. Well, that is something near an expression of opinion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTEREST ON SCHOOL BONDS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 11122, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11122) to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved July 13, 1886, and the act of Congress approved June 19, 1902, entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes," is hereby amended so as to authorize the issuance of bonds by school districts in Oklahoma Territory having a bona fide population of not less than 5,000 persons for erecting necessary school buildings and purchasing the ground for same. The limitations of said act of July 13, 1886, shall not apply to such school districts: Provided, That before any bond shall be issued the mayor and common council of the municipal corporation composing in whole or in part such school district shall cause an election to be held in such district, and said mayor and common council shall cause to be published in a newspaper of general circulation published in said district a notice of the time and place or places of holding such election. Such notice shall be given at least thirty days before such election. On the question of the issuance of said bonds no person shall be qualified to vote unless he be in all respects a qualified elector and owner of real or personal property subject to taxation within the school district. In case two-thirds of the qualified voters as above described shall vote affirmatively for the issuance of said bonds, then the mayor and common council shall certify the result to the board of education, and said board shall issue the same, and not otherwise. Said bonds shall contain all necessary provisions as to form, and such school district shall provide a proper sinking fund for the redemption of said bonds. Said bonds shall not bear a rate of interest exceeding 6 per cent, and the interest shall be paid semiannually, and none of the said bonds shall be sold at less than their par value: Provided further, That no school district under this act shall issue bonds in excess of 6 per cent of the valuation according to the last preceding assessment of the school district issuing the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if there are now laws for the issuance of bonds for school purposes—for building schoolhouses, etc.?

Mr. McGUIRE. Yes, sir. We had a law passed in 1902 which provides that bonds of cities of 5,000 people or more shall draw interest not to exceed 4 per cent and can not be sold for less than par. They can not sell their bonds and can not build schoolhouses, and the only change from that law is that these bonds will draw 6 per cent interest and may be sold for par.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the bill been favorably reported from the Committee on Territories?

Mr. McGUIRE. It has been favorably reported and unanimously reported.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And there is no minority report?

Mr. McGUIRE. There is no minority report.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that this matter is in a form similar to other bills which have been passed by Congress and only affects particular cities of a certain limitation in population and for the special purpose of facilitating the building of schools and the caring for school children.

Mr. McGUIRE. That is correct.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask this question also: Does it require a two-thirds vote or a majority?

Mr. McGUIRE. Two-thirds vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The bill is very specially guarded in that respect.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Suppose there is a bonded debt of the city or county, will this be an addition to the other bonded debt upon the same citizen or is there a limitation on the amount? I understand it is 6 per cent here; but suppose there is another bonded indebtedness on the same people, is there a limitation here to prevent a great amount of taxes to be levied upon it? Is there any limitation?

Mr. McGUIRE. The only limitation is the general 4 per cent limitation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And this bill does not change that?

Mr. McGUIRE. No; this bill does not change that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. This is to enable them to get a larger interest per cent on bonds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCGUIRE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ALLOTMENTS TO INDIANS ON WHITE EARTH RESERVATION, MINN.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5255) to provide allotments to Indians on the White Earth Reservation, in Minnesota, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to allot to each Chippewa Indian now legally residing upon the White Earth Reservation under treaty or laws of the United States, in accordance with the express promise made to them by the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, and to those Indians who may remove to said reservation who are entitled to take an allotment under article 7 of the treaty of April 18, 1867, between the United States and the Chippewa Indians of the Mississippi, 160 acres of land; and said allotments shall be, and the patents issued therefor, in the manner and having the same effect as provided in the general allotment act, "An act to amend and further extend the benefits of the act approved February 8, 1887, entitled 'An act to provide for the allotment of land in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and extend the protection of the commissioners of the United States over the Indians, and for other purposes,'" approved February 28, 1891: Provided, That where any allotment of less than 160 acres has heretofore been made, the allottee shall be allowed to take an additional allotment, which, together with the land already allotted, shall not exceed 160 acres: And provided further, That if there is not sufficient land in said White Earth (diminished) Reservation subject to allotment each Indian entitled to allotments under the provisions of this act shall receive a pro rata allotment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WESTERN ALASKA CONSTRUCTION COMPANY.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 5088) to aid the Western Alaska Construction Company, and in connection therewith ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if there has ever been any report on this bill?

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, I would inform the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] that the bill has been reported, and the report is House Report No. 2229, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. MADDOX. Favorably?

Mr. BRICK. Favorably reported.

Mr. MADDOX. I will ask the gentleman why he desires to have the committee discharged?

Mr. BRICK. Because it has passed the Senate, and in that way we can save this bill from going back to the Senate.

Mr. MADDOX. Is the Senate bill the same as the House bill?

Mr. BRICK. Exactly word for word.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the Western Alaska Construction Company to hereafter operate its railroad in the district of Alaska for a period of five years after the passage of this act without the payment of the license fee of $100 per mile per annum on each mile operated, as provided in section 29, chapter 1, of the act entitled "An act for making further provisions for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1900: Provided, however, That this exemption from said license fees is upon the condition that said company shall build at least 10 miles of railroad each year; but if more than 10 miles be built in any one year it shall be credited to the work of the succeeding year.

Mr. GILBERT (interrupting the reading of the bill). I object.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be captious, but I understand this is a bill to exempt the railroads of Alaska from the payment of the tax imposed by the general law enacted two years ago. There was a general law requiring railroads in Alaska to pay a license tax of $100 per mile, and, as I understand it, this bill seeks to exempt this particular railroad from the payment of that tax. Is that right?

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will reserve his objection until I can explain the bill, I think he will not object.

Mr. GILBERT. Very well; I will do that.

Mr. BRICK. I think the gentleman has been misinformed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague will permit me to interrupt him, I wish to state that I was at one time opposed to the passage of this bill, and rose at this time to reserve the right to object for the purpose of making an explanation.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, I will inform the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] that this is the only proposed broad-gauge railroad in Alaska, and that this bill is not for the purpose of exempting it from taxation except during the period of its construction.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, is there not a general law in Alaska requiring that railroads pay a license tax of $100 per mile?

Mr. BRICK. There is a general law requiring railroads to pay a license tax of $100 a mile, and the only reason for this bill is that during the period of its construction, which is fixed for five years, this railroad shall be exempt from the payment of that tax. There are completed now about 10 miles, and work can only be conducted about four months in the year.

Mr. GILBERT. Does the general law apply to other railroads in the process of construction?

Mr. BRICK. It will apply to other railroads, and it will apply to this railroad under this bill after it has been constructed. It is very advantageous to the Seward Peninsula, where they have no waterway for purposes of transportation and where transportation now costs from $300 to $500 per ton, that this railroad should be so encouraged that it may be built on that peninsula.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, there is no law exempting a private citizen from the payment of a tax while he is building his house, and I do not see why this is not a sop thrown out to the railroads.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Speaker, I will say in explanation to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] that the great necessity of Alaska to-day is transportation, trails, and railroads. We have investigated the matter, and we find that the people of Alaska desire this railroad to be encouraged. They desire that it be built, and for the purpose of encouraging persons to invest their capital upon what seems to be and what appears to us to be a gambling transaction—one which would be liable to failure up in that country—we desire to encourage the completion of this railroad. After its completion the railroad will then pay, under the general law, the tax of $100 per mile.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, with a mental reservation, I shall withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina objects.

GRANTING CERTAIN LANDS TO THE STATE OF ALABAMA.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8703) granting certain lands belonging to the United States and situated in the State of Alabama to the State of Alabama for the use and benefit of the common schools of that State, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the lands belonging to the United States and commonly called public lands or Government lands and situated in the State of Alabama, which are classified as coal and iron lands and which are withdrawn from homestead entry, mineral land entry, or other entry by act of Congress, approved March 3, 1883, United States Statutes at Large, volume 22, page 487, as shown by the lists on file in the General Land Office at Washington, D. C., are hereby granted and conveyed to the State of Alabama, in trust, nevertheless, for the use and benefit of the common schools of said State.

SEC. 2. That the said State, under such regulations as the general assembly thereof may provide, may lease or sell and convey any or all of said lands at any time, but the proceeds arising from the sale or lease of such lands shall be forever kept invested in interest-bearing bonds of the State or in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, or other security approved by the governor and the State superintendent of education, and the interest arising therefrom shall be expended for the use and benefit of the common schools of that State.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make, or cause to be made, a full, accurate, and complete list and description, as far as practicable, of the said lands, and shall deliver the same to the governor of Alabama within six months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 4. That all proceeds arising from said lands, whether from lease, sale, or rents, or from interest on bonds, shall be used and expended, per capita, without regard to race or color, among all the children taught in the common schools of the State.

SEC. 5. That this act shall in no wise interfere with or deprive any person who has heretofore made a homestead entry but who has not yet completed his final proof and received a patent of any right he has or may have under existing law, and any person who has filed an application to enter any of said lands classified as above stated, shall be permitted by the Secretary of the Interior to make his proof of residence and entry on said lands and shall receive his certificate of final proof, and on making final proof as now required by law in regard to lands subject to homestead entry, shall be entitled to his final-proof certificate and to his patent just as if said lands were subject to entry under the homestead laws.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 3, line 1, insert, after the word "entry," the words "and who has resided continuously for at least five years before the approval of this act on the lands so homesteaded."

In line 7, page 3, after the word "stated," insert "and who has resided on the same, as his homestead, continuously for at least five years before and up to the time of the approval of this act."

In line 13, page 3, after the word "entry," insert "and of continuous residence as above stated."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of the bill. How many acres of land are there?

Mr. BURNETT. About 90,000 acres. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that these are lands that are subject to neither the homestead entry nor the timber and stone entry. They are lands that are held up by the act of Congress of March, 1883, and the purpose of this is to give them for the benefit of the public schools without regard to race, sex, or previous condition.

Mr. PAYNE. Why would it not be a good thing to open them up to homestead entry?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, we believe that those lands would most benefit the State of Alabama by being opened for the benefit of the public schools. There are a large number of acres of lands already open to homestead entry that are not mineral lands, and we think the public interests of Alabama can be best subserved by allowing these to go to the building up of the public schools.

Mr. PAYNE. Have those lands any mineral deposits?

Mr. BURNETT. They are classified as coal and iron lands.

Mr. PAYNE. How much land has Alabama already had for school purposes?

Mr. BURNETT. Nothing for the public schools, except the one-sixteenth of a section. Most of the Western States have a much larger amount. Under our new constitution we are applying almost half of the State taxes to the benefit of the public schools, and we believe that if these public mineral lands which are not subject to homestead nor to timber and stone entry are applied for the benefit of the public schools it will aid us very much in the development and improvement of our educational system.

Mr. PAYNE. Have these lands ever been thoroughly examined to ascertain what minerals are to be found there?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; there are 90,000 acres which have been classified by the Interior Department as being coal and iron lands. This matter has been twice before the Committee on Public Lands, and the bill has unanimously received a favorable report.

Mr. PAYNE. I always regret to disagree with the Committee on Public Lands; but I should like to know what the States are going to do that have not had any public lands—States that have no public lands within their boundaries, and other States that have received only single sections.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is their misfortune.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the gentleman will not make objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] objects.

DIAMOND SHOALS LIGHT-HOUSE, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. On the 15th of February last, by order of the House, the bill (H. R. 7264) to provide for the construction of a light-house and fog signal at Diamond Shoals, on the coast of North Carolina, at Cape Hatteras, was made privileged for consideration. I call that bill up now, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The bill reported by the committee as a substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Albert F. Eells, of Boston, Mass., be, and he is hereby, authorized, with such others as may be associated with him, to construct, in the manner and on the conditions herein specified, a substantial and sufficient light-house and fog signal of the latest and most improved construction, together with such auxiliary works of the most modern character and such as will be necessary to maintain the same permanently, at the outer side of the outer Diamond Shoal, on the coast of North Carolina, at Cape Hatteras.

That the construction of said proposed light-house and fog signal shall be in good faith commenced within twelve months from the date of the approval of this act.

That the said light-house and fog signal shall be constructed and placed where the water is at least 30 feet in depth, mean high tide.

That the construction of the superstructure or tower of said light-house and fog signal above the line 30 feet above high-water mark shall conform to the specifications contained in the letter from D. W. Lockwood, lieutenant-colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, secretary of the Light-House Board of the Department of Commerce and Labor, to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated February 3, 1904, except as to the brick lining specified, and in lieu thereof the floors shall be supported by metal framework designed by said Eells, and further, except as herein modified. Any changes or modifications in design or construction which may hereafter appear to be necessary by either the Light-House Board or the said Eells may be made by consent of both parties.

That there shall be erected above said structure, as aforesaid, a circular steel tower or mast of sufficient diameter to contain a spiral stairway, which shall extend a sufficient height so that the light to be placed thereon shall be at least 200 feet above mean high tide, all to be substantially and securely constructed and braced.

That the said Eells shall make his own plans for the construction below the line 30 feet above high-water mark herein provided for.

That detailed drawings and specifications of that part of the structure above a line 30 feet above mean high water and including the lantern, watch room, and service room, which must conform to the standards required in the Light-House Service, shall be submitted by the said Eells to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor for approval in advance of construction.

That the plans and specifications of that part of the structure from the base of the foundation up to a line 30 feet above mean high water shall be furnished to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor for the purpose of determining the stability of the completed structure.

That the lens and equipment for said light, light-house, and fog signal shall be furnished by the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, upon demand, in New York, without expense to said Eells or his associates, when the said structure shall be sufficiently completed to permit of their installation. The said Eells or his associates shall transport the above to the site of the light-house and install same under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall designate a suitable place for the site of the said proposed light-house and fog signal within sixty days after written request therefor from the said Eells or his associates. During the progress of the construction of said light-house the same will be inspected under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who will pass upon all materials and workmanship, and any part of either which is not in accordance with the usual specifications of the Light-House Board must be satisfactorily replaced by the said Eells or his associates, the expense of inspection to be paid from the general appropriation for the Light-House Service. The said Eells or his associates shall furnish suitable quarters and board for the inspector designated by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor when employed at the site of the light-house.

That the cost of the lens and equipment of the said light, light-house, and fog signal shall be paid for from appropriations to be hereafter made for that purpose by Congress.

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe the color or colors of which the outer part of said structure shall be painted, and the class or kind of light and the manner in which the same shall be exhibited. That when the said light-house shall be placed in position, in accordance with the conditions herein specified, and ready to be lighted, that the said Eells and his associates are hereby authorized and required to maintain the said structure and operate the said light station, in accordance with the regulations of the Light-House Board, for a period of one year, and at the cost and expense of said Eells and his associates and successors. That at the expiration of said period of one year the said light station shall be delivered to the United States and shall be placed under the control of the Light-House Board, who shall be required, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to maintain and operate the said light station in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by said Board and at the expense of the United States for a period of four years.

That at the expiration of five years after the date when the said light station shall have been completed and lighted, and which period shall embrace the one year during which the said light station shall have been maintained by said Eells, if the said light-house structure shall be in a substantial and secure condition and in all respects sufficient for the purpose of a light-house at the place where located, and such fact shall be so certified by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, then and in such event the said Albert F. Eells, or his assigns or legal representatives, shall be authorized to demand from the United States the sum of $590,000.

Provided, That if the said Eells and his associates shall fail to construct the said light-house in accordance with the terms hereof, or shall fail to maintain and operate the same for one year, or if at the end of said five years the said structure shall not be in a substantial and satisfactory condition, as hereinbefore provided, then and in such event neither the said Eells or his associates, or their heirs or personal representatives or successors, shall be entitled to demand or receive from the United States any compensation whatever, in whole or in part, by reason of any act or acts done in pursuance hereof: Provided further, That if the said light-house shall not be accepted the same shall not be used by the United States.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How much time shall we who are opposed to the passage of this bill be allowed for its discussion?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That has not yet been fixed. I am more than willing to hear any suggestion on that point from the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have several requests for time and would ask about an hour.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. An hour on each side?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. All right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. VREELAND). The request is made that debate on this bill be limited to one hour on each side, the time in favor of the bill to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the time in opposition by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to authorize Albert F. Eells and his associates to construct a light-house at Diamond Shoals, at Cape Hatteras, on the coast of North Carolina, which runs 8 miles out from the mainland into the sea. Before undertaking to enter into a thorough explanation of this bill, I will first explain the terms upon which this light-house is to be constructed. I read from the amended bill:

That when the said light-house shall be placed in position, in accordance with the conditions herein specified, and ready to be lighted, that the said Eells and his associates are hereby authorized and required to maintain the said structure and operate the said light station, in accordance with the regulations of the Light-House Board, for a period of one year, and at the cost and expense of said Eells and his associates and successors. That at the expiration of said period of one year, the said light station shall be delivered to the United States and shall be placed under the control of the Light-House Board, who shall be required, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to maintain and operate the said light station in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by said Board and at the expense of the United States, for a period of four years.

That at the expiration of five years after the date when the said light station shall have been completed and lighted, and which period shall embrace the one year during which the said light station shall have been maintained by said Eells, if the said light-house structure shall be in a substantial and secure condition and in all respects sufficient for the purpose of a light-house at the place where located, and such fact shall be so certified by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, then and in such event the said Albert F. Eels, or his assigns or legal representatives, shall be authorized to demand from the United States the sum of $590,000:

Provided, That if the said Eells and his associates shall fail to construct the said light-house in accordance with the terms hereof, or shall fail to maintain and operate the same for one year, or if at the end of said five years the said structure shall not be in a substantial and satisfactory condition, as hereinbefore provided, then and in such event neither the said Eells or his associates, or their heirs or personal representatives or successors, shall be entitled to demand or receive from the United States any compensation whatever, in whole or in part, by reason of any act or acts done in pursuance hereof: Provided further, That if the said light-house shall not be accepted the same shall not be used by the United States.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I think that that provision or, rather, the terms of the bill are very unusual. The man who proposes to construct this light-house denies himself the privilege of receiving one dollar for this work until after the expiration of the five years, when the light-house has been thoroughly tested, its capacity ascertained, and its efficiency established.

Then, at the end of that time, he can apply to the Government for the compensation of $590,000. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Government can not possibly be better protected in any contract that it could make than under the terms proposed in this bill. The bill has been carefully prepared, having in view the full protection of the interests of the Government under all contingencies.

Now, why, is the natural inquiry, is it that such broad and liberal terms should be proposed by Mr. Eells and his associates, who propose to do this work? Does anyone question the fact, Mr. Speaker, that Diamond Shoals on the South Carolina Atlantic coast is one of the most dangerous places between ports on the North and South Atlantic coast in the matter of navigation? It has been shown, Mr. Speaker, in the evidence which has been taken in the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, to be one of the most dangerous points in the world. This is clearly shown by the testimony of experts.

I have statistics to the effect that within the last decade more than a million and a half dollars' worth of property has been lost and destroyed at that point by reason of the fact that there was no light there to guide the mariner. I am aware that a light-ship is anchored some 6 miles from where the light-house is to be constructed. But the hearings show that the maintenance of the light-ship is expensive, and it is insufficient for safe navigation.

Now, the minority of the committee and the majority agree upon what I think to be very substantial and material points in this case, and that is that there is an actual and an absolute necessity for the construction of a light-honse at that dangerous point. We agree upon another material fact—that it is one of the most dangerous points in the course of navigation, as I have said, between North Atlantic and South Atlantic ports. What else is there about it? I am just as little disposed to grasp at shadows or undertake to espouse chimerical enterprises as anyone on this floor.

The first point, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of business, is to convince this House that there is a necessity for a light-house at that point; second, that the Government is amply and fully protected in this contract. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I want just to say a word further as to the necessity. The Light-House Board in 1888, under an act of Congress, was authorized to enter into and make a contract for the payment of $500,000 to construct a light-house at this very place. Plans and specifications were prepared by the Light-House Board and the contract to construct it made with Anderson & Barr, of Pittsburg. On that subject the Light-House Board said:

The board is satisfied that it is entirely practicable to erect the necessary structure at or near the outer shoals; and in view of the dangerous character of the shoals at Cape Hatteras and the great loss of life and property that occurs there annually and the urgent demand of commerce, the Light-House Board is of the opinion that provision should be made at once for the establishment of a light and fog signal at or near the outer shoal, Cape Hatteras, North Carolina, and the suggestion is therefore made for a proper recommendation to Congress that an adequate appropriation be made therefor.

These conditions described in the recommendation of the Light-House Board exist to-day, Mr. Speaker, just as much as they did, and even more so, than when the Light-House Board made this recommendation; and therefore there can be no question raised in the mind of any gentleman on this floor as to the necessity for such a light-house being constructed at that point. That it is feasible and practicable is demonstrated not only by the recommendation of the Light-House Board, but by the indorsement by the best engineering skill of this country.

In addition to that, since that time the Light-House Board has recommended a different kind of a project for the establishment of a light-house there, providing for a breakwater, and the establishment of a shore station at Hatteras Inlet—costing the Government $1,600,000. These are the undisputed facts in this case.

Mr. Speaker, this is no new bill. It was up in the Fifty-seventh Congress without having received a hearing before the House. It was my pleasure to serve in the Fifty-seventh Congress on the subcommittee appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on this subject, and a favorable report was made. The majority of the committee indorsed this bill. The same thing was done in the Senate; but neither bill was brought to a final hearing in the Fifty-seventh Congress. Senator McMillan in the Senate, in the Fifty-seventh Congress, in the report of the committee, said this:

This bill has not the approval of the Light-House Board, as will be seen by the accompanying letters, but your committee, after a long and careful consideration, have come to the conclusion that a light-house at this point would be of very great benefit to navigation, and that the Government may well give Captain Eells and his associates an opportunity to attempt to place one there. The bill has been so amended as to amply protect the Government, and should the project fail the Government will lose nothing. Should it be successful, the Government will have secured a much-desired light-house at a reasonable cost, and the loss of property and life in this vicinity has been very great and has been largely due to the want of a proper light. To neglect the opportunity for such a valuable aid to navigation, with every reasonable prospect of success, would be reprehensible.

Mr. Speaker, it will be perhaps said that Mr. Eells has not established his engineering skill and ability to such an extent as to command the confidence of the House. Before addressing myself to this feature of the case I will briefly, for the information of the House, give the character of this work. It is to be sunken into the ground or sand in a depth of water not less than 30 feet, and the caisson is to be sunken not less than 15 feet, or a sufficient depth to secure a safe foundation.

The caisson is to be filled with masonry and concrete up to a point at least 20 feet above the mean water. This is to be solid masonry, except there shall be sufficient space in it to contain a storage of fresh water and supplies in part for the light-house. Above this goes the tubular steel structure. The bottom of the caisson is to be 70 feet in diameter and is to be bell-shaped and to go up gradually, decreasing in diameter, so that at 30 feet above the top of the water it will be 27 feet in diameter.

From that point is erected a circular steel structure, and that goes up 20 feet farther, and it is to be 25 feet in diameter at the top. On the top of that is to be constructed another tubular steel structure of sufficient diameter to contain a spiral stairway in order to reach the top, and the light is to be on the top, not less than 200 feet over mean low water. The light, it is stated, can be seen in ordinary weather the distance of 30 miles. I think Mr. Eells has established the fact by the testimony of disinterested persons that his plan is feasible—is practicable.

I will refer briefly, Mr. Speaker, to the gentlemen who came before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on these hearings and see what they say about it. First we have a statement of Capt. John C. Silva. He says:

I appear for the American Association of Masters and Pilots of Steam Vessels. Our organization is made up of 10,000 people. We cover a territory from Manila to Alaska and San Francisco; on the Great Lakes, from Thousand Islands to Duluth; and on the Atlantic coast, from Key West to Eastport, Me.; and we also have representation on the Gulf and the Mississippi River.

I believe that I probably represent more men who pass Hatteras on every trip made by our ships than any man employed in any other capacity that I know anything about. We have in our membership such able men as Capt. Robert Quick, of the Morgan Line of steamers, controlled by the Southern Pacific Railroad. I believe Captain Quick has made more passages to the southward passage and to the northward passage of Hatteras than any other man in America. We also have Captain Kimball.

The Mallory Line, the Ward Line, the Cromwell Line, and nearly all of the masters employed by the large corporations are members of our association.

Our association wishes to indorse this bill in the most hearty way we are able to do so, for this reason: Under present conditions no one is ever sure whether any signal is there to mark the spot. I know from personal experience that a light-ship is maintained there at present. I also know that that same light-ship was adrift last month.

Now, the next gentleman who came before the committee and gave elaborate testimony on this subject was Capt. Luther B. Dow. He says:

I wish to say, first, that in my travels past Cape Hatteras it was the custom that if we were not actually bound in there never to see the light. If we did, the changes come so quickly that we were in trouble absolutely, and we could not get off. I have come up past there in a northeast gale of wind in a sailing vessel hoved to, where we were making 4 miles leeway, and have absolutely drifted to windward 2 or 3 miles an hour against a northeast gale of wind that was blowing from 50 to 75 miles an hour.

The changes come so quickly there that I have gone below to look at the glass and before I arrived on deck it was upon us. The changes are so sudden, more so than in any other part of the country I was ever in.

We have always considered it one of the worst places in the world, and at my office in New York the masters of the Morgan Line, the Mallory Line, the Clyde Line, all of those that belong to the association which I represent, come into my office and make these reports. They say, "If it is possible for you to do anything while in Washington to have a permanent fixture off Cape Hatteras, for God's sake do it for us."

And there are others. Mr. Speaker, I will refer to but one other gentleman in this connection. The majority report has the indorsement of many others alike distinguished in engineering and commercial lines:

NEW YORK, March 3, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I have examined with care your plans for foundations of light-houses or jetties and think favorably of them. With the suggestions I have made with a view to greater future security, I approve the designs and should be willing to trust them to accomplish the desired object. I think that a light-house built in accordance with these designs in 30 feet of water exposed to the action of the ocean would be permanent and safe.

Very respectfully,

L. L. BUCK.

I leave the indorsements to be read by other gentlemen who will take part in this discussion. Now, Mr. Speaker, the only objection that I understand is really made to this bill in the report of the minority is simply this: That if Captain Eells fails in this undertaking, as Webb & Anderson did—the first contractors, who contracted in 1888 with the Light-House Board for $500.000, recommended and indorsed by the Light-House Board—if Captain Eells fails in this, it is said he will come back and ask the House of Representatives or Congress to give him damages or recompense him in some way for his failure.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is based upon the supposition that the Members of this House, in the face of the plain, open contract that is made, will disregard its plain and binding terms so as to give Eells damages if he comes back and asks the same after he has failed to meet the conditions that he has voluntarily agreed to. I have no hesitancy in saying from my association with him, from the opinion that I have formed of his integrity and character, that he never will make such a request upon us here. He sincerely believes, just as Eads did in the construction of the Mississippi River jetties, when so many doubted whether it could be done or not, that he will make this a success.

He gives, Mr. Speaker, the highest and best evidence of his faith and confidence that a man can possibly give. He asks not a dollar of compensation. Not one cent of money is to be paid to him, his associates, or representatives under this contract until the light-house has been established there for five years and its entire sufficiency and capacity made satisfactory in every respect.

What greater evidence can a man give than this? Somehow or in some of his many interviews with me Mr. Eells has communicated to me the faith that is in himself, and I believe that time will show that the Light-House Board is mistaken in their judgment that his plans are not practicable and that his efforts will result in failure. So much am I convinced of his final success that I earnestly desire to see him authorized to make the trial.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has been drawn as carefully as a bill ever was drawn, and by reading it any gentleman will see that all of the specifications connected with this matter have been submitted to the Light-House Board and have been ingrafted on this bill. What objection can anyone have to allowing Mr. Eells to undertake this enterprise? The Government risks nothing; the Government is in no jeopardy.

Under the contract, as I said just now, surprising as it may be, entered into by a man possessed of an infatuation and a faith that surpasses understanding as to his ability to accomplish this great work at this dangerous point, what possible objection can anyone have to allowing him to make the experiment? It is to be under the control of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and all of the specifications provided for and entered into are to be under the direction of the Light-House Board. The material to be used must be inspected and approved by the Light-House Board authorities. Who is more interested than Eells in putting in good material?

As Senator McMillan said, the Light-House Board stands opposed to this project. Why? Mr. Speaker, these hearings disclose that reason. I read, for the information of the House, from the hearings, questions addressed by the distinguished chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Colonel HEPBURN, to Colonel Lockwood, chief of the Light-House Board:

The CHAIRMAN. In your judgment is there a disposition on the part of the board, in view of the fact that this is an experiment that is not to cost the Government anything, to cooperate and give us the benefit of your judgment and your aid, so as to get the best possible scheme for this work?

Colonel LOCKWOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition that the Light-House Board has nothing to do with, according to the bill, except to furnish the lens and equipment, and I do not think the bill is clear on that point; whether it means the board should put it up or whether Captain Eells should put it up is not clear.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any objections to helping this committee to get that into a definite and proper shape, so as to get the best possible results for the Government out of this experiment?

Colonel LOCKWOOD. I am perfectly willing to give all the information that the board has with regard to what it considers to be necessary in a light-house in this locality; but so far as the foundation is concerned, the board, I think, has no suggestion to make about that. I certainly would have none.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You do not want to assume any responsibility?

Colonel LOCKWOOD. Not a bit.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You do not assume any responsibility in this bill at all, do you?

Colonel LOCKWOOD. No; except after it has been operated a year the Light-House Board takes hold of it and operates it for four years, and after the Light House Board has operated it for four years the Secretary of War certifies it is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The reason for that was, it was believed the Light-House Board was hostile to this scheme?

Colonel LOCKWOOD. I do not think any member of the Light-House Board would be hostile to any—I would not use the word "scheme," but I will say any plan for any light-house in that locality that is regarded as feasible and possible of construction, and that would answer the purposes of a light-house when completed, when it has to take hold of it. You see, the board has got to operate this as it stands there. It is a light-house that is going to cost a good deal, and in the opinion of the board it ought to be one with the most modern of illuminating apparatus that can be put in.

The CHAIRMAN. Why is it not the part of wisdom on the part of the board to help us to get the proper description of what should be put in there? Suppose you were to provide new specifications as to what should be used for a perfect light-house, for the accommodation of the crew, and for the practical uses of this structure.

Colonel LOCKWOOD. That is already given.

The CHAIRMAN. Put that into the specifications.

And it was put into the specifications according to the directions of the Light-House Board, and everything was done to the extent, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, of loading down this bill, as it were, with certain conditions and specifications that even threatened its success; but notwithstanding all of this, Captain Eells is ready and willing to go forward with this work. This, Mr. Speaker, is simply and purely a business proposition. I admit that I am not possessed of any engineering ability or skill, but I think I understand as plain and simple a proposition as this.

Here we all admit that there is an imperative necessity to protect this dangerous point with a light-house in the interest of both life and property. The Light-House Board has heretofore declared that the plans recommended by them to construct a light-house at the same point were practicable, and the board also declares, of course, that a light-house is absolutely needed at that point.

It is true that the plans indorsed by the Light-House Board were a dismal failure. But here comes a man—an odd genius, you may call him—and he says, "Give me a chance, and I will build you a light-house at the same point for about the same amount that the Light-House Board contracted for; and if I do not build a suitable and sufficient light-house, you need not pay me a dollar." That is all there is in it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, it is always an ungrateful task to oppose the passage of a bill which does not interest one personally or one's constituents or one's particular section of the country. I feel also that it is an ungracious thing to oppose the will of a majority of a committee which I esteem so highly as I do the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and if it were not that I believe this was thoroughly a vicious bill, entirely deserving defeat, I would not raise my voice in opposition to it.

The reason that some of us on the committee and others on the floor of the House oppose the passage of this bill is that we believe it thoroughly impracticable; that the light-house provided for can not be built; that it only involves every one connected with it, the contractor on the one side and the United States Government on the other, in a certain course of trouble and disaster throughout all attempts at such construction.

As I said, we believe this light-house can not be built under these specifications provided in this bill, that the conditions of the bottom of the sea where the light-house is designed to be located are such that a foundation can not be had. This belief of ours is based upon reports of engineers who actually know about the conditions of the sea bottom there. This is not a new and an untried proposition. This matter has been before this House for a number of years, and this proposition, almost identically, has been before the Light-House Board and this House for nearly ten years.

It was before the last Congress and the Congress before that, and there has been repeated opposition on this very ground, that it always has been an impracticable and a dangerous undertaking, and I will state the reasons for that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is it not a fact that the Light-House Board practically concedes its inability to build a structure at that place with any reasonable expenditure, and that they have exhausted their ingenuity?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all. Mr. Speaker, the Light-House Board report this, that it is a desirable thing—remember, a desirable thing, not a necessary thing—to have a light-house at that point; that a light-house can be built there if a proper foundation be secured; that soundings have been made to the depth of more than 105 feet, and the deeper the borings the softer the mud and the sand are found to be.

The result is that no foundation can be built unless rock be sunk to an immense amount, thousands and thousands of tons, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. About a million and a half of dollars, is it not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; a million and a half of dollars would build the whole structure.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is their proposition?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There would require to be built a breakwater 1,400 feet long, as I remember, and inside of that there would be a foundation, and upon that foundation there could be constructed a light-house. This whole proposition of a breakwater and the foundation and the light-house would cost a million and a half of dollars. Now, that is the best opinion of the Light-House Board after about fifteen years of careful, disinterested investigation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is according to the theory of the board.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, as I said, for that reason the board and the engineers of the board, examining this thing for a long period of years, believe that method is the only way to properly construct a light-house at that point and any other such as this would be entirely impracticable, impossible in producing any beneficial results. The water at that point is 30 feet deep at mean low tide. So far as they have bored that sea bottom at that depth lie these quicksands, which will not support a foundation except constructed at this enormous expense. Now, the board also reports that it is not absolutely necessary for the purpose of navigation that this light-house should be at that point.

Five and three-eighth miles off at sea from this point a light-ship is located, and the official investigations and reports for the last three years and more, almost four years, show that light-ship has been adrift only three days and seven hours; and the Light-House Board further insists strongly and without any conditions that even if this light-house be constructed successfully at the particular point designed for this one, yet these light-ships must be maintained just the same.

The construction of the light-house will not economize in the slightest in the use of light-ships.

It thus seems the enormous expense contemplated by this bill is not warranted by the actual conditions at that point. Since 1875, by the official reports of the Life-Saving Service, there have been only eighteen wrecks at Outer Diamond Shoal, and the main part of these were before the establishment of the light-ships, in 1897, and of the few since most have been caused by the carelessness and incompetence of the mariners.

Surely this condition does not warrant such a tremendously expensive undertaking as this. Exaggerations have been and will be made concerning conditions here. But such are the official, uncontroverted facts. Then, too, remember that light-ship has a duplicate. There are practically two light-ships there. One relieves the other, so that there is always a light which mariners can find at that point. And the apparatus for holding these ships in place are entirely capable of doing it. They do not drift or float away, but can be depended upon to a certainty to remain as marked upon the charts. Light-houses could do no more.

Remember also that this light-ship casts a light 5¾ miles beyond the radius of the light which would be cast by this light-house, if erected. These ships will reach the greatest distance, will accomplish the most good, and practically answer all necessary purposes. But repeated solicitations have wrought upon the patience of a majority of our committee.

Again, the minority of the committee believe that even if a light-house be constructed according to the plans provided in this bill, it will be quite impracticable to operate it.

The Light-House Board, in their testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, stated that many years ago—probably twenty years—under General Casey, when he was superintending engineer of the Light-House Board, a list of specifications was made for the construction of light-houses in the United States, and the most important specification was that there should be a brick lining for light-houses in situations like this.

This was insisted upon for many reasons: First, on account of healthfulness, it being believed that in places like this, exposed and damp and cold, it was necessary that this sort of a lining should be provided in order to protect the stores, the water, and the provision in the storehouse, and, more than all, the health and life of the inmates.

Remember, this light-house is to be constructed to a height of about eight stories, and each of these floors will be occupied by some sort of stores for the light-house—water and subsistence for a year, fuels and oil, boats, and various things.

This space is absolutely necessary; and on top of it, nearly 200 feet up in the air, it is necessary to place the fixtures and the lamps—weighing, I think, from 12 to 14 tons. Hence it is requisite that there should be this strong, stable, capable structure of brick. Now, all provision for a brick structure is eliminated from this bill, and instead it is left to a sort of new scheme, untried before, of a metal lining, which the Light-House Board reports is impractical, will be unhealthful, and inadequate for the necessary purposes of such a structure.

Remember that this brick structure has been provided for in all specifications for all the other light-houses on the coast except this, and this is the one light-house on the whole coast which ought especially to have this brick lining, not only for the healthfulness of the inmates, but for the purpose of affording additional weight and solidity for the light-house in connection with its foundation. Even conceding that it can be built, which the minority do not believe; even conceding that it would be practicable, which the minority do not believe, this light-house would, if built, be worthless to the Light-House Board for the reason that it would not have this brick lining.

As I said, the brick lining is necessary for two reasons: First, for the sake of the additional weight for the structure in order to balance and hold it firmly in place, and this additional weight means much right here: in the second place, to afford the space and protection and ventilation necessary for the health and comfort of the inmates. I think the House can not overestimate that point. Even if constructed according to the bill, this light-house would be almost worthless for practical purposes.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] states that there would be no liability on the part of the Government if this contractor should fail. The minority of the committee, including myself, differ with him on that point.

I realize that the majority of the committee have done the very best they could to prevent liability on the part of the Government if the contractors should fail. I know they have acted in the best of faith in trying to prevent any contingent liability on the part of the Government in the case of failure. But, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to accomplish that result.

There always will be enough difference of opinion between the Light-House Board and the contractor as to construing and carrying out the provisions of a bill like this to base some kind of a claim against the Government to influence some committee of this, or more especially some other legislative body, to grant favorable consideration for a claim. Notwithstanding the provisions of this bill, notwithstanding a solemn agreement not to make any claim, claim agents have mysterious ways their wonders to perform. It was so under previous contractors.

In 1891 another concern—a Pittsburg concern—had a contract to construct a light-house at this very point. They were experienced contractors; they had experienced engineers. They went about the work in a practical way, but they made a failure at the very outstart in trying to sink a caisson at this very point, and the failure was caused by the very things which we believe will be equally fatal to this contractor—the shifting sands, lack of firm sea bottom, the strong tides and eddies, and storms.

In that former case there was a provision that the contractors should have no claim in case of failure—a provision just such as this. But it was not a year before those contractors were haunting Congress with their claim; and they did succeed in getting a a favorable report from the Committee on Claims of this House in the Fifty-fourth Congress upon their claim for $100,000.

Now, in the very report of the majority of the committee there is a foundation for a claim; there is a loophole, a condition, which gives the very opportunity which may nullify the very provision in the bill designed to prevent claims. It shows how honest men, good men, will differ about complicated and technical provisions of a bill like this. The majority of the committee state in their report that the bill provides that Captain Eells shall construct the base up to a point 30 feet above the surface of water—implying by that that he will have the absolute right in his own way to construct this base to that height—and on that base a superstructure shall be erected under the provisions of the bill.

This report represents, of course, the views of able, honest, and disinterested men. It of course would represent also the views of Captain Eells on this very proposition. But it is evident, if this contention and construction be allowed, that all power of supervision, all power of requiring the installation and erection of the qualifications necessary to a proper light-house will be taken away from the Light-House Board and Captain Eells can erect just such a foundation as he pleases, can scrimp and save as much as he pleases, and if it be insufficient and inadequate, as would be probable if these conditions be allowed, then the Light-House Board and the United States Government would be helpless to protect itself.

Whether suited or not, whether adequate or not, whether adapted to purposes of construction or not, the majority of the committee believe Captain Eells can force such a structure upon the Government within the terms of this bill.

Now, the minority of the committee do not believe the bill should bear that construction; we do not believe it ought to bear such a construction. We do not believe that this contractor should have any right to begin this foundation, to commence the construction, until the plan for the whole structure, all parts included, shall be approved by the Light-House Board.

There is a difference of opinion, and a most serious and fundamental difference of opinion, at the start. That very difference of opinion may be, in case of failure, the basis of a claim of $500,000 before some future Congress. Here is a basis for claim not covered by the bill, and it can not be covered by this or any other provision, because the contractor will claim he was wronged and prevented from a success by the action of the authorities of the Government and the Treasury should compensate him for such a wrong.

As I have said, I believe that this will be a failure. I believe it can not be a success, from the very condition of things, and in case of failure this very difference of opinion will bring this man or his assigns haunting the doors of Congress for years with a claim of half a million dollars against the United States, when the Government has not received one bit of benefit. It will be a detriment rather, because it will postpone the day when enough money will be appropriated to construct an adequate light-house, conceding the necessity to be such as to call for such an enormous expenditure of public money.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this contractor is probably a good man. He probably believes in his scheme. But it is to be remembered that he has had no experience in this kind of business. Not one single experienced engineer has gone upon the ground, has examined the conditions as they are there, and has approved the whole plan of this structure and foundation.

This man has obtained the opinion of able engineers as to the foundation alone. He has obtained opinions of able men and disinterested men in approving that method of sinking a foundation; but he has not obtained, and can not obtain, the opinion of one single able disinterested engineer of high standing that the whole plan, including all parts and specifications to make a complete and adequate and proper structure, is practicable, because the only engineers who have examined it, the only engineers of standing and experience who know, have unanimously declared it is impracticable and dangerous.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Just who are the engineers that you are now speaking of?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. All the engineers who have served on the Light-House Board since the beginning of this project.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Precisely.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Recently General Mackenzie and General Haines and Colonel Lockwood, men in whom we are accustomed to place such confidence that millions of dollars are spent by them under direction of Congress.

Men who are spending from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars per annum, under the general authority conferred by Congress, on their own judgment and as they think wisest and best—this is the class of men who declare that this proposition is entirely impracticable, dangerous, and absurd. We trust them with other plans costing millions of dollars; we trust them in all those cases to perform the most skillful and dangerous and expensive tasks with the utmost confidence, and yet the gentleman from Maine has the hardihood to declare that this class of engineers have opinions based upon actual knowledge and experience and disinterestedness which are not worthy to be considered in a project like this. And in his turn he asks us to trust a man absolutely without any training or experience, who has shifted his plans from one method to another as rapidly as shift the sands which will cause his destruction, who does not know or realize conditions, and who seems ready to promise most anything to pass this bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Is it not true that if all you say is absolutely true and he should make a failure, the Government can not possibly lose anything by it?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is just what I stated, Mr. Speaker. In this way, that there will inevitably be a difference of opinion between the Light-House Board and the contractor in construing the provisions of this bill. The report of the minority has pointed out at the very start a most serious difference of construction between the gentleman from Alabama and the minority of the committee, and this very difference of opinion between those gentlemen and myself may be the basis of a claim for half a million dollars against the United States Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, does not my colleague admit we have guarded against that?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I state the fact that you have tried to guard that in placing a provision in the bill by which in case of failure no claim shall be made; but, Mr. Speaker, you can not guard against differences of opinion or the differences of construction that are bound to appear in a complicated proposition of this kind, and it is differences like those that will be the basis of the claim, because such will be regarded as a wrong by the contractor so great as to cause his failure. His claim will be the failure will be caused by the construction and action of the Light-House Board instead of by the necessary natural conditions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You admit that the Light-House Board said it was practical to put a light-house there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Why, they said that if there was a proper foundation, if a break-water were built, if an immense mass of rock were dumped there, then it would be practicable. It is the only way that experienced engineers claim it can be done.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague and myself occupy very much the same position on this bill. I would like to ask him one or two questions, if he has time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is there any evidence showing that Captain Eells himself possesses any means or has the financial ability to complete this structure?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, Mr. Speaker, Captain Eells does not pretend he has, but claims——

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman—no matter what Mr. Eells claims—does the gentleman think that anybody in the country with money will be so foolish as to give it to Captain Eells to carry out his harebrained scheme?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not believe it; but I can not answer for the rest of the country.

Mr. MANN. If it can not be done, there will be nothing for which to make a claim against the Government of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I rather differ from that proposition. He may have means sufficient to proceed with the undertaking, get into a hot quarrel with the Light-House Board, then make the expected failure, and claim continuously and persistently, as he has for the past ten years in getting this legislation, that he should be reimbursed on account of the conduct of the authorities of the Government.

I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the committee on this bill were not unanimous. There were differences in the committee. I want to call the attention of the House to this fact. Diamond Shoals are said to be the most dangerous to navigators on our coast. It is a shoal 8 or 10 miles from the coast, without a possibility in very many instances of the navigator knowing of their presence or his proximity to the shoals until he is upon them.

It is so important, so dangerous to navigation, that the Light-House Board have two vessels that are practically devoted all the time to this particular dangerous part of the coast. The expense of these vessels is quite considerable. The expense to us is a much larger sum than the interest would be upon the appropriation that is suggested. Many attempts have been made to secure a permanent light-house at that point. Up to this time all efforts have resulted in failure.

An elaborate scheme was attempted a few years ago of building a great caisson, floating it to that point with the purpose of filling it with concrete and making a permanent basis for the superstructure, but that failed, owing to the washing underneath, which canted the caisson. The plan was abandoned, and then, as my friend has suggested, the men who agreed that except upon success they were to present no claim against the Government, did present a claim and did secure a favorable report from one of the accommodating committees of this House. We have tried to guard against that possibility in the preparation of this bill and had thought with a considerable degree of success, but if we have not we will be glad to entertain any suggestion from any gentleman that will put it entirely beyond the power of this contractor to make any claim except after complete success has crowned his efforts, and that success is certified by the acceptance of the structure by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

That is our idea. That is what we want to accomplish. That is the agreement of the contractor or the proposed contractor, and if we have failed we are willing to have the advice and counsel of our friends in making the bill absolutely secure upon that point, for the understanding, as repeated over and over again, is that there is to be no claim unless this structure is made in accordance with the plans proposed and that it has stood the test of time, namely, five years, and we have been assured by gentlemen familiar with the subject that during that period of five years we will almost certainly have one of those unusual and terrific storms that at intervals assail that coast.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to make this observation simply as one of the gentlemen who have not been favorable to the proposition, that, so far as guarding the interests of the Government is concerned, this bill is as admirably drawn as all the Philadelphia lawyers put together, with their familiar repute, could draw it. I do not think there is an addition that could be made to the bill as presented to better safeguard the interest of the Government. Of course that does not involve the other question necessarily.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very doubtful whether by the use of masonry in that particular place it is possible within the limit of anything like reasonable cost to secure a masonry foundation for that structure. The constant agitation of the waves upon the shoals, the proximity to the Gulf Stream, the proximity to the Hatteras currents, make it almost certain that at every season of the year there is that constant agitation of the surface that prevents successful work of that kind. At least every one that has been attempted in the fifty or more years of effort up to this time has proven abortive. This contractor has a scheme that he thinks will be sufficient. He proposes an immense caisson supplied with valves and with other apparatus in the bottom by which he can extract the sand from underneath, sinking the structure to the depth of 50 or more feet, filling it with concrete and in this way securing a structure that will be durable even after the iron coating has rusted away, and upon that he expects to build the superstructure.

The bill differentiates between different parts. That part of the structure that reaches up to a point of 30 feet above mean tide the contractor is responsible for. There is to be no interference, as I understand it, under the bill with his schemes and plans with regard to that part of the entire structure. Above that the comforts of the employees, the sufficiency and security of the light, and all matters of that kind are to be provided in accordance with plans designed by the Light-House Board and are to meet with their approval in all respects except the one alluded to by the gentleman from Minnesota—namely, the brick lining.

That brick lining, as I understand, was not for the purpose of additional solidity, nor for the purpose of additional strength, but for the comfort of those who would live inside of this iron structure. It was thought that for the purposes of health it would be better that the brick absorbent should be here, but when it was suggested that our vessels were not lined with brick, and that men were reasonably healthy within such structures, I thought those gentlemen who had proposed this argumemt rather abandoned it and believed that some other substitute might be adopted which would secure the health and comfort of those who must live in it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is just this: Here is a most dangerous point upon our coast that we are insufficiently guarding, because the storms will drive adrift the vessels we send there. We are trying to protect them by light-ships. These are inadequate and insufficient, and often at the very time when most needed, or sometimes at least when most needed, these vessels are not there. They are not so efficient as a light-house would be when they are in their best estate and in their proper place. They are expensive; they are constantly to be repaired; they are frequently to be renewed; they are all of the time to be maintained, and the expense of their maintenance is not an inconsiderable one.

Now, this man says that he can do what up to this time the Light-House Board has failed to do. He proposes to do it at his own expense. He proposes to run every risk. He proposes that no money shall be paid by the General Government until he has verified his success, until he has shown to the satisfaction of our own officers that that which we want to be accomplished has in fact been accomplished. He has the faith of his own convictions to such an extent as that he will invest all that he has saved during a life of labor. He has satisfied other men—men of capital—that it will be, that it may be, a success, and they are willing to attest their confidence in it by their subscriptions to the general fund.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to stand in the way of any measure which will give guidance or light to the mariner and thereby save human life, but I believe this proposition to be a chimerical one and that if it should by chance prove successful it would be a most wasteful one. Let us consider the proposed location. For a depth of 105 feet there is the softest quality of sand, with nothing suitable for a foundation. It will show how little consideration had been given to the difficulties of the location to know that when this offer to build a light-house was first presented it was with a plan providing for a foundation only 15 feet deep.

That upon which it is sought to make this offer appeal to the House is the assertion that it is a sort of "no cure, no pay" proposition. It is said that if nothing is accomplished the Government is not indebted. Any Member of this House who has experience knows that it is impossible to foreclose the possibility of a claim being asserted here which has a basis of the nature which would be created by this proposed undertaking. You can not make language strong enough to shut out the claimant. As our respected Speaker at one time said, claimants may die, but claims never do. Before our Committee on Rivers and Harbors, on several occasions, we have had requests for payments for improvements where the language was much stronger and more unequivocal than in this case, and have found great difficulty in asserting the prerogative of the House against the insistence of the Senate that they should be paid. There is, as pointed out by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], in the provisions of the bill itself an ambiguity which might lead to the presentation of claims.

But if it should succeed it would be wasteful and extravagant. Five hundred and ninety thousand dollars is the amount proposed to be paid for this light-house, a part of the amount in two years, the balance in five years, I believe. Suppose we call the present worth of the amounts to be paid $500,000. Mr. Speaker, that is more than has been expended for any light-house in the United States. It is the most expensive proposition of this nature ever presented to Congress. An estimate was made that a suitable light-house could be erected in the same locality for $300,000; indeed there was one estimate of $150,000, and if this light-house is constructed let us see what the Light-House Board and other engineers have said on the subject. It is, however, regarded as necessary that the light-house on the shoal be protected by the construction of a breakwater partially inclosing it, and also that a shore station at Hatteras Inlet be provided. These are considered as essentials to the economical construction and certainty of maintenance.

Mention has been made by the advocates of this proposition of the very large estimate for a light-house there made by the engineers of the Light-House Board, but every one of these estimates included a breakwater and a shore station to cost over a million dollars. They joined with that estimate the assertion that in order to protect and utilize the light-house a breakwater and shore station would be necessary, so we must not only count the original cost, or $590,000, but we must consider the cost of the breakwater in addition to that. Now, suppose it is successful, suppose this plan succeeds, what does the Light-House Board say in regard to the utility of a light-house there?

It is not believed that a light-house on the shoal would be of as great advantage to navigation as is the light vessel moored about 6 miles beyond the shoal. The only disadvantage of the light vessel is the possibility of her being torn from her moorings in a storm, but with the improved system of mooring, as practiced now on this same light vessel, that danger is much less than it formerly was.

The probable cost of building a light-house on Hatteras Shoal, North Carolina, including a shore station at Hatteras Inlet and a protected area for the light-house behind a breakwater, is estimated at $1,588,000.

It thus appears that a light-house here would not only be unduly expensive, but also of doubtful utility—less advantageous than a light vessel 6 miles away.

It should also be noticed that the estimated cost of the improvement in that report was based upon an estimate of $300,000 for the light-house, instead of $590,000, the amount carried by this bill.

To pass this measure would be to disregard the recommendations of all the officials of the Light-House Board. Now, I have no absurd or overrated respect for the executive officers of the Government, but I do think before we enter upon a project which has the condemnation of such men as General Mackenzie, the present very able Chief of Engineers; of General Hains, recently retired, who was one of the ablest and most careful officers of this force, and of every other official who has examined it—all condemning it as a chimerical measure—that we should not only hesitate, but that we should vote down this proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope that this bill will be favorably acted upon by the House and will be allowed to pass. I come from a district that is bordered upon the seacoast, a large number of whose people go down to the sea in ships; and I want to say to the House that the people in my district, as well as the people all along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, are interested in the demonstration of the feasibility of building a light-house structure which up to date has not been built by the exercise of the ingenuity of the Light-House Board.

We are interested in the maintenance of these lights upon the dangerous points of this coast in order to protect property and human life. The people who live in my section interested in maritime matters have their vessels moving up and down all this coast. Petitions from hundreds of millions of capital are on file asking for this legislation. The people thus applying for this measure represent marine insurance companies, shipbuilding companies, steamship companies—persons interested in the coastwise trade, in the transportation of their property. These people all feel, from Quoddyhead to the Rio Grande, that it is important to have the feasibility of this project demonstrated, if it can be demonstrated, either at the expense and by the exercise of the intelligence and capacity of the officers of the United States, or, lacking that, by the intelligence and capacity and at the risk of the property of the people who do not happen to be officers of the United States Government.

Now, I know of no man on the floor of this House on either side that lives in a maritime district who does not heartily support this bill; and these men support the bill not because they have any personal interest in it, but because they desire to see this fact demonstrated, if it can be demonstrated.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], when I simply rose in my place and asked him who the engineers were who undertook to express an opinion that this project was not feasible—and that is all I asked him—said that it was the engineers connected with the Light-House Board; and then he remarked that "the gentleman from Maine" had the hardihood to suggest that these engineers were not entitled to credit in this House.

Well, sir, in the first place, "the gentleman from Maine" did not make any such suggestion. It was the inner consciousness of the gentleman from Minnesota, with his knowledge of the members of this board and the attitude they have maintained toward this proposition, that led him to put into the mouth of "the gentleman from Maine" language that I never did use and that I do not now use. But I will tell the gentleman what I have the hardihood to say; and I will not edit it out of the RECORD. I have the hardihood to say that the members of this Light-House Board do not occupy, with regard to this projected improvement or this projected light-house, the attitude that they should.

I believe that the members of the Light-House Board, with Colonel Lockwood at their head, are actuated largely by a feeling that they do not care to have this project become a success unless it becomes such under the shadow and guidance of members of that board. I do not entertain that view and I do not sympathize with it. It is an instance of the provincialism that is absolutely characteristic of every single branch of the United States Government and every man in every bureau of it. It comes from the fact, perhaps, that they naturally and properly desire to aggrandize the positions that they now hold.

Now, let me have the attention of the distinguished gentleman who suggested that this proposition was chimerical, and if not chimerical, wasteful in the last degree. Assuming that those two propositions are well founded, that is the end of this proposition. What did the gentleman from Ohio say, after having demonstrated to his own satisfaction its chimerical character, basing his view upon the opinion of engineers who have a prejudice against allowing an outside individual—a common citizen, a seafaring man as I know Captain Eells to be, who has plowed the water himself for years and accumulated such little property as he has by reason of such plowing—to make this effort? It was upon the opinion of these gentlemen, who maintain this attitude, that the gentleman based his assumption that this is a chimerical proposition.

Why, sir, Captain Hutchins told me that he did not want a light-house if—what?—if it tended to interfere with the maintenance of a light-ship! And why? Because light-ships were under his particular jurisdiction; and light-ships must live, no matter who else may die, and no matter how much the public service might otherwise be benefited. Nothing should interfere with the light-ship! This was the expression of Captain Hutchins to me; and that is where I get in part my view of the sentiment that inspires the attitude of this board in connection with this question.

The gentleman from Ohio said that this project was wasteful, if not chimerical. Let me call attention to the fact that only $590,000 can be expended for this purpose, and that sum can not be expended until the efficiency and success of the project has been demonstrated after five years' exposure in that position. Not a dollar is to be paid until this has been demonstrated. And then the gentleman from Ohio suggested, when that had been demonstrated and its success had been established by experience, that you would have to build a breakwater, at an expense of a million dollars, in order to make successful a proposition already demonstrated a success, and therefore it was wasteful. Well, that does not make very much for the ingenuousness and candor of the gentleman, because it does not involve a breakwater.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this significant fact. This is not the first time that legislation with similar provisions has been presented to this House. We have to-day jetties in existence in sixteen of the great harbors and river mouths of this country that are known as the "Eads" jetties. How does the House suppose that the Eads jetties were first constructed? Who built them? The Board of Engineers of the United States? No. Was it through their ingenuity and their skill? No. Was it the result of their indorsement that the experiment to build them was made? No. Whose was it? Was it the result of bureau work of these men of great intelligence and capacity? No. Captain Eads himself, after years of effort, got the high privilege from the Congress of the United States of constructing the first jetty at his own expense.

Now, I do not know whether he had money, as it may be that Captain Eells may not have all the money necessary for this. But Captain Eads succeeded about twenty-five years ago in getting enough capital interested to build the first jetty, and it was built at his expense, and the Government did not pay a dollar for it until fifteen or twenty years afterwards, when it had demonstrated its success; and you would not have had a jetty to-day if we had waited for these distinguished gentlemen who represent these various boards, and had relied on their intelligence and ingenuity for the construction of these matters. It has proved of very great utility in connection with our merchant marine and has saved the River and Harbor Committee from increasing largely their appropriations.

There are sixteen different harbors in which these improvements have been made, upon the basis of the experiment of a private individual, precisely parallel to this. And I say this upon the authority of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, because I went to him five minutes ago and asked him what were the facts in connection with the construction of these jetties. Here is what the War Department says as to the practicability of maintaining jetties:

> In view of the experience at Humboldt Harbor, California, where an increase of depth of from 16 to 22 feet has been secured by nearly parallel jetties unaided by dredging, there would seem to be no question as to the utility of such means of improvement under suitable conditions.

Mr. GILLETT of California. And that has been increased to 31 feet.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And the gentleman from California tells me since this report was made on the operations of the jetties in that locality they have increased the depth to 31 feet. I do not intend and do not desire to make any reflection upon any department of the Government or upon any man who has faithfully discharged his duty. I have a great respect for these men who represent the Light-House Board. They are entitled to it. I am upon perfectly friendly terms individually with all of them. I have applied to them time and again in matters for the people among whom I live and whom I have the honor to represent. The fact is that here is an illustration that demonstrates the fact that individual enterprise has resulted in vast advantage to the United States Government. Now, I would like to say just a word here as to the utility of the light-ships that are now maintained on the shoals. The chairman put this question to Captain Hutchins:

> The CHAIRMAN. Do you know that he gave this opinion on the 21st of January, 1888?

He answered as follows:

> The matter of the establishment of a light-ship, as requested by the petitioners, was referred to the inspector of the fifth light-house district for report, and on January 9, 1883, that officer reported that to establish a light-ship as asked would simply cause a continued loss of life; that all gales from the southward and eastward, which are extremely severe there, would have a tendency to cause the light-ship to break adrift, and that no earthly power could prevent every soul on board from being lost on the shoals to leeward, as the sea is heavy at all times.

Now, it ought to be said in fairness that since 1888 the Light-House Board have improved the facilities in connection with light-ships so as to make them more safe now than ever, and yet the fact remains that during this very last winter, during one of the most severe gales that visited this coast, when that vessel was needed more than at any other time during the last twenty years in order to protect the mariner and warn him from the fatal shores—that this light-ship, secured as it is to-day by the best appliances known to engineering science, went adrift and was gone some two or three days even before anybody connected with the Light-House Board could locate it anywhere on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman know very well the Light-House Board says that is not true?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. At that time they were not able to state.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But they stated positively that the man who made that statement made a mistake.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I heard Mr. Hutchins testify before the committee, and the impression created in my mind by the answers made by Mr. Hutchins was that he was not prepared then to state. He may have done so later. I do not know how that may be.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They did.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, if he did that later, I will withdraw the suggestion so far as that is concerned; but while I was there Mr. Hutchins did not present to the Interstate Commerce Committee any definite evidence stating to that committee where that vessel was. As I understood, not only had this vessel gotten away from their control, but they were not able to give the committee definitely the information then as to where it was.

My friend from Minnesota says they did later, and I have no doubt he is correct, but they were not able then to give that committee the information whether or not, as a matter of fact, the rumor was or was not well founded. So that here you have this simple proposition: Here is Captain Eells. I do not think he is a man of large means, but I know a great many of the petitioners who are behind him in connection with this proposition, and I know the capitalists are behind them. Hundreds of millions of capital are represented upon these petitions, and I have not any question that he is able to gather the capital for the purpose of carrying out this enterprise.

Now, if he is successful the Government pays him $590,000. It would cost, according to the estimate of the board, $1,600,000 to build what they say would be a suitable structure. They do not deny that the interests of navigation absolutely demand the best appliances possible to make that dangerous point on our coast as safe as possible. Now, there is an expenditure, if the project proves a success, of only $590,000. I confess I am not so much disturbed with the suggestion of my friend from Minnesota, which is entitled to some weight, no doubt, and the suggestion of my friend from Ohio that this may lay the foundation, if the enterprise is not successful, for a perennial claim against the Treasury of the United States.

I hope this House has not yet reached a very profound degree of decadence. I think the present membership of this House has sufficient intelligence and moral courage to stand up against a proposition like that if it was presented, and I am going to assume, for the purposes of this argument and for the purposes of my support of this measure, that the gentlemen who will represent the American people for years to come on this floor will have the same intelligence, and the same common sense, and the same courage, and will be able to pass the same intelligent judgment, and if they have, that figment of the imagination should not disturb any man in reaching a favorable conclusion upon this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, it may appear gratuitous for a Member coming from an inland State to oppose a measure which is of interest particularly to a coast State and to the entire coast traffic of the country. However, after a careful examination of the evidence presented before our committee, I can not bring myself to the support of a measure which, in my opinion, is already predestined to fail, and which, if a failure results, will establish another precedent which may possibly form the basis of a claim upon the Treasury of the United States.

Had this been an original project to construct a light-house on the Outer Diamond Shoals, and had no unfavorable experience been had with the construction of foundations for a light-house at this particularly dangerous spot, it might be that at this time we could give indorsement to the project; but the experience which we have had on the part of the Government in this particular locality is such as to render opposition to a repetition of this same experience entirely justifiable. Some ten years ago an effort was made to establish a light-house in this particular place. A contract was let to Messrs. Anderson & Barr, of Pittsburg. They constructed a caisson which they towed out to the place indicated and sank it there; but owing to the changing conditions of tide and wind and shoal that caisson sank of its own weight, so that the water floated over the top of it, and during a single night one side of it sank 7 feet lower than the other.

In other words, it was that much out of plumb, and before anything could be done to save the caisson a storm came, broke off the upper portion of it, so that it had to be abandoned, and the machinery thereon was wrecked. The project authorized, in this bill also contemplates the construction of a caisson. It also requires the floating of this caisson to a place where the water is at least 30 feet in depth. The Anderson & Barr caisson was to be located in water less deep and where the difficulties therefore were less than those to be encountered by Captain Eells under this bill.

The water must be at least 30 feet deep. It is his idea to construct a caisson with a diameter at the bottom of 70 feet. This is to be carried up 30 feet above the mean low tide, and the plans and method of construction are to be wholly within the control of the contractor. The Government assumes no responsibility with reference to the foundation or understructure, but as to the superstructure the Government prescribes the plans and specifications.

Therein, I think, lies the danger wherein this new project is predestined to failure. Captain Eells has obtained a patent upon his proposed construction. I sought and secured a copy of that patent. His idea is to sink this caisson into 15 feet or more of sand, then fill in with concrete, build it up 20 or 30 feet above the level of the water, and then for a superstructure he originally designed to build a tube of steel going down through the center of the concrete to the base of the caisson and extending upward 175 feet above water. Upon the top of this tube or mast was to be placed the lantern.

Midway between the base and lantern there was to be an enlargement of this tube or mast for the accommodation of the light-house keeper and for his supplies. This mast was to be strengthened by means of shrouds after the manner of masts in ships. These shrouds were to be anchored to the caisson and masonry below, giving the necessary rigidity to the superstructure. This bill wipes out all of that.

We say by the bill that Captain Eells shall put up a superstructure the same as Anderson & Barr were to put up in 1890. Such a superstructure contemplates several stories or rooms of diameter of at least 30 feet for the accommodation of at least three boats, the greatest of which shall be 28 feet in length, while storage room is to be provided for the accommodation of thousands of gallons of oil and thousands of gallons of fresh water and many tons of coal. Surmounting it all provision must be made for the proper mounting of a lantern weighing something like 14 tons.

If he can bank and lodge his caisson, as he thinks he can, in 15 feet or possibly more of shifting sand, he might possibly put up a successful light-house with a superstructure such as he originally contemplated, but we have handicapped him in requiring him to put up a superstructure there such as the Government contemplated, with sufficient accommodations for four men, with sufficient supplies, etc. To prove that he himself had some doubt as to his ability to comply with the regulations and requirements of this bill, I wish to read from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, aside from that, are you willing that those specifications shall be part of your contract with the Government to put this structure in the condition that they require for the accommodation of the light and the light-house keepers, and so on?

Mr. EELLS. I am in your hands; you can arrange the matter, of course, as you think proper, but I understand what the requirements are at sea; I know how much the men want and how much they should have for their provisions, and I should like to be within bounds—that is, not to build a great structure that the sea is going to strike and the wind is going to strike, but I would like to make it as compact as possible. That is my point in the matter.

Now, the idea of luxury and comfort is a small item; the idea of safety is the important thing. If we are going to expand this thing and make a lot of boathouses, and story after story, it is going to be unsafe, and the probabilities are that it will be knocked over, and I do not want that old failure tacked on me. In the case of the Anderson & Barr enterprise, people from Pittsburg made the plans and they tried it and it was a failure. The start was a failure, and if they had gotten further with it it would have been a failure. So I say I don't want a failure tacked onto me. That is all there is about it.

We tack on the specifications required by the Light-House Board, and in this admission of Captain Eells he seems to create the impression that if these specifications are complied with the project will be a failure. Now, the Government does assume a risk. The contractor may take care of it for the first year, but the Government must take care of it for the next four years; and should the storms gather and the winds blow 90 to 95 miles an hour, as they do off Hatteras, dashing the spray of the sea on a lantern 200 feet above the level, there may be a failure, there may be a second Minot Ledge disaster, and with the possible loss of the men goes the loss of the lantern and the other appliances which under the bill are to be supplied at the cost of the Government.

Under the circumstances it seems to me, as one gentleman has said, the plan is chimerical. Captain Eells has never put into practical use his own patent, although some eight years have elapsed since he secured it. For these reasons I believe that the Government should not enter upon the project, nor should it give him the opportunity to even experiment with a thing predestined to fail. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I feel somewhat as did the gentlemen who have preceded me in speaking for the minority report, that possibly motives may be misconstrued. It would seem to the average person that any proposition with the idea of preserving life upon the sea ought to have the favorable consideration of this Congress.

But, gentlemen, we are obliged to act upon this case according to the evidence that has been presented and the circumstances known to us, and I can not go so far as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] even by innuendo to convey the impression that the gentlemen who have testified against this measure are not actuated by as high motives and as sincere in their desire for the welfare of "the men who go down to the sea in ships" as the gentlemen who have advocated the bill.

The proposition which came before us was presented by a gentleman who has confessed himself to have had no experience in engineering, who has never had anything to do with the building of a light-house, and who, as has been so well stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, had a plan originally which was undoubtedly provided by somebody else, but he was willing in the end to have tacked to it specifications which, if carried out, must, according to his previous testimony, make this scheme a failure.

The proposition is to go out upon the Diamond Shoals and upon the shifting sands and undertake to erect this light-house. I say "shifting sands" understandingly, because, as has been stated, borings have been made to the depth of 105 feet, and the conditions are the same or worse as you go down. It has been demonstrated that the caisson which was sunk near the proposed location in 1890 sank overnight and the whole structure was destroyed, and there is no other plan now except some patent scheme which this gentleman has for a caisson; and if gentlemen of the House would read the testimony they would discover that when this man was discussing what would be the effect of the currents, which are so intense at that particular point, he said that the first effect would be to wash away the sand, but that afterwards the counter currents, or something of that kind, would set up a contrary action and fill the gap that was made by the force of the waters as they came up against this structure which has been sunk in the sea, and a bank of sand would form around the base. Is that common sense? Is a skilled engineer to be censured for opposing such a scheme?

But, gentlemen, I am afraid we are losing sight of the fact that the advocates of this scheme are founding their most forceful arguments upon the basis that if it is not a success it will not cost the people anything. I submit, gentleman, that if this measure had been presented without that guaranty there is not a member of the committee who would have voted in favor of it, because he would have said it meant failure. Gentlemen, if it is a fact that in our most candid and unbiased judgment failure is to be the result, are we going to say that this man shall be allowed to undertake this enterprise and proceed with this work at his own expense, if he fails?

If we believe it is impractical and visionary, shall we become a party to the imposition of hardship and ruin upon this "seafaring man?" Mr. Speaker, if failure is the probable result after we have loaded down his original plans with specifications of our own, can we or our successors refuse him or his heirs relief when he or they come to Congress with a tale of misfortunes which we have made possible?

If we must undertake a scheme condemned by the men whose business it is to know, let us not put the burden upon an individual; neither allow him and his friends to speculate on the Government. In the end, success or failure, the people will pay this bill. You can not protect the Treasury with the armor of a contract, however impervious it may seem to be made. The part this Congress takes in this business to-day will preclude opposition when misfortune or ruin shall demand relief in the future.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Who besides himself would be injured if the scheme should result in failure?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If it is true that no claim would ever be presented on account of the work that had been done, nobody would be injured. But I ask the gentleman if, after we have put in this specification, and if, after this man has gone to all this expense, the loss of that light-house should occur in consequence of circumstances which may be developed, are there gentlemen on this floor, much less gentlemen on our committee, who would fail to vote to do this man justice after we have voted this foolish scheme upon him?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is not this precisely parallel with the case where Captain Eads said that he could properly deepen the mouth of the Mississippi River by jetties which he would put in? But it took him ten years to get Congress to consent to the adoption of that system, because the engineers of the Government said that it was not feasible, just as they say the same thing of the present project.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has cited that case, but he failed to state that Mr. Eads was a practical engineer, who knew of his own knowledge just what the situation was down there at the mouth of the Mississippi.

But I come back to the proposition I was discussing. It is conceded by gentlemen here that without this guaranty nobody would have voted for the proposition.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. With reference to Captain Eads, while, of course, he was an engineer—and I did not state in detail what his qualifications were—is it not true that for years he stood here trying to get authority to build that work at the mouth of the Mississippi, against the practically unanimous opinion and objection of the engineers of the Government?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have so heard. I do not believe that that is a question that should govern this situation though. Furthermore, the Light-House Board have stated that a light-ship is located out there where the light is needed, and that it has been adrift but three days since April, 1900; they have stated, also, that during the period the light-ship was there most of the time it was simply a sailing vessel, and that they have incurred an expense for two steam light-ships aggregating in cost more than $170,000. Furthermore, these light-ships are now more securely anchored, and the board believes it has a plan of anchoring which is reliable and secure, and these ships are located out in the sea where they are needed. They are over 5 miles out from the outermost shoal.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will yield to the gentleman, but I do not want to lose all of my time.

Mr. WACHTER. What is the report of the Light-House Board in regard to this project?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is adverse.

Mr. WACHTER. Do they refer to the former attempt to build light-houses there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They do.

Mr. WACHTER. Is this very much different from any of the attempts that have been made to establish a light-house there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No, sir; the outward circumstances are practically the same. This gentleman has a patent whereby he is going to pump sand out of the bottom of the sea in order to maintain an equilibrium in this light-house, and thereby insure his scheme. Gentlemen claim that the Light-House Board have not maintained and never can maintain any ships out there. They speak without the record. It has already spent money for locating them at that point, and they ought to be tried. There is no reason why they ought not to be tried to the fullest extent.

I understand, as I have said, that this light-ship is 5 miles out from the farthest point of the Diamond Shoals. Vessels can go inside the light-ships and outside the outer shoals and still be secure. This light-house, built on the inshore, in a fog would be no protection to the mariner if he gets out of his course and out of the range of the light. Destruction would surely befall him. So that there can be no question, it seems to me, but what it is the part of business prudence for us to test the matters that are being tried by the Light-House Board in regard to their light-ships. Let them be tested as they ought to be tested, out in the sea, where they are needed, and then the best results will be secured. We have greater assurance of their success than we have of that of a light-house where this bill proposes to establish it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to be understood that it is a fact, or that the testimony before the committee shows, that light-ships are preferable to light-houses? On the other hand, is it not absolutely true that wherever they can be maintained, and wherever they have been, even within a reasonable limit, the light-house is the thing to give protection on the coast?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no question on the same location. But it is probable that these light-ships can be maintained 5 miles off at sea, but a light-house could not be.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman state as a fact that a light-ship is preferable to a light-house, even if it can be maintained?

Mr. TOWNSEND. In that particular locality?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In that particular locality.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe the evidence warrants me in saying that a reliable light-ship at that place is preferable, and there was some evidence to the effect that both would be needed if a light-house were erected.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The Light-House Board considers that a light-house would be necessary?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They said it is most desirable to have a light-house; that there ought to be one there. And I believe, so far as they are concerned, if they could devise a scheme within reasonable limits of cost they would have no objection to building one, provided there was any hope of success.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman desire any further time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wanted to say something in response to the gentleman from Iowa, in which he stated that the maintenance of these light-ships in this particular locality was at a great cost to the Government. The evidence on this question is this, that it costs about $13,500 to maintain these two light-ships. Now, if you appropriate $590,000 for a single light-house, you thereby possibly deny many points that ought to have light-houses, and I submit the expense of the light-house would greatly exceed that of the light-ship. If you spend $590,000, the interest on it at 3 per cent would be more than $17,000, and you have got to maintain it just the same.

The expense is therefore in favor of the light-ship, and inasmuch as the light-ships are already owned by the Government and have been recently equipped with new anchoring devices, approved as satisfactory by the Light-House Board, is it not more than foolish to vote $590,000 to build a house upon the sand which when the winds and waves beat upon it will fall, and while the sea will roll over it it will not bury the folly of the Congress which knew better but listened not to reason?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Alabama to use some of his time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ].

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that there should be any opposition to this bill. It seems to me that this is a proposition which ought to commend itself at once to the business judgment and to the humanitarian interest of every Member of this House. This is no mere local question, and it ought to enlist an interest and a sympathy as broad as humanity.

Without having time to go into any technical detail, I want, in a few words, to place the situation as it is before this House. At Cape Hatteras, well known and named as "the graveyard of the seas," beneath whose stormy waters and surging whitecaps, where the god of storms hurls his mightiest winds upon the face of the sea, have gone down hundreds of ships, and thousands of lives, and millions of wealth, because of the want of some adequate light to flash over those stormy waves to give warning to the mariner before he is driven on that deadly coast.

The Light-House Department confesses itself practically, as it has done for all these years, unable to cope with the situation, and we have there only two light-ships, unstable, being drifted out of their course and not high enough to give light across the waves. Every effort heretofore to establish a light-house there has been a failure, and it is confessed by the Government engineers that it would cost millions and millions of dollars to build one according to any plan known to them. Here we have a proposition, simple on its face, made by an individual, that for $590,000, to be paid to him after this light-house shall have been built and successfully operated for five long years, and that fact certified by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and only then, the money paid to him; that he will build and maintain this light-house, and give security to the men who go down to the sea in ships.

Why should any man object to that proposition? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks, "Would any man put up $500,000 on this hare-brained proposition?" Yet we are assured that the money will be put up, that the effort will be made, and that if not a success the Government will not be out one penny. How, then, can we lose? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that every man who votes against this proposition takes upon his hand and upon his head the blood and the life of every seaman who shall go down to death in those treacherous waters because of the failure to enact this law. [Applause.]

Ah, gentlemen say it is impossible. Impossible, gentlemen, is a word that ought to be, and soon will be, erased from the English vocabulary. Whatever American genius and American enterprise shall undertake is possible to American genius and American enterprise. [Applause.] In the glorious and growing light of daily invention and discovery there ought not to be any such word as "impossible" in the English language. [Applause.] Aye, it was impossible to build a light-house at Eddystone. Sapient scientists said it was impossible, and effort after effort failed, yet British genius and enterprise surmounted the obstacle, and from the top of the light-house at Eddystone flashes the light which saves lives and commerce.

We hear a great deal about the maritime commerce of this country. Do you know that Hatteras stretches out into the sea at a very dangerous angle, and that Diamond Shoal stretches out 7½ miles farther, surrounded by shoals and visited by storms as is no other portion of all our coasts; that it is directly in the way of the entire coastwise commerce of the United States from the North Atlantic to the South Atlantic and Gulf ports, and will be in the direct way of commerce which is to go through the Panama Canal when it is finished? Mr. Speaker, I belive that this project is possible; I believe that it is practicable; I believe at all events that, with no cost to the Government, in the interest of human life, in the interest of commerce, in the interest of the coastwise service, we ought at least to make an experiment which costs us not one dollar, and which may be fraught with so much good. [Great applause.]

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, as a considerable number of my constituents are interested in the coastwise and trans-Atlantic trade and, in common with all other persons connected with the shipping interests of the country, are also interested in the best possible safeguards for our mariners and shipping, I am very sorry that this measure comes to us in such form and with such infinitesimal reason to believe in its wisdom, that it seems to me it should not have our approbation, and my reason for reaching that conclusion can be comparatively briefly stated. I am not averse to this proposition simply because it has failed to obtain the approval of the engineers of the Light-House Board. I am against it because it does not have the approval of any engineering authority.

I am against it because it is contrary to the reasonable conclusions which any person may form who considers the conditions that attach to the situation and are involved in the project. Now, a few years ago it was proposed to erect a light-ship at the Pollok Rip, off the coast of New England. That course had a shifting channel, but it had a good, solid foundation after you got below the immediate surface. That proposition was submitted to those engaged in the coastwise trade and to eminent engineers, and they expressed the opinion that if you could anchor Captain Eells's caisson—and they saw no reason why you could not do it in that locality—you might construct a certain form of light-house above it. But no engineer has ventured the opinion that you may satisfactorily sink this caisson on the Hatteras Shoals to a certain required depth and there find any sort of suitable, enduring, and stable foundation and be able to build and maintain a great light-house upon it for any considerable period of time.

Considering what it is proposed to do—to sink this caisson to a depth of 15 feet or less in that soft and mayhap shifting sand, and then proceed to build a superstructure of 230 feet above the level of the sand as it now lies, and after you have several stories of living apartments built in the air, to put 14 tons of weight at the top of the light-house—it seems to me to be a foolhardy proposition. I want to ask whether the life of every man who would be engaged upon that enterprise would not be jeopardized by the enterprise itself? I want to ask if by any fortuitous circumstance that structure should stand in those soft, shifting sands for one year and we then manned it with the officers and employees of the United States Government, whether a most direct responsibility would not attach to us for any catastrophe which might subsequently ensue?

Now, bear in mind in connection with this that this excellent sailor, this excellent shipbuilder, as I understand him to be, who comes here with this project, disavows all knowledge of engineering problems. He has a caisson which he claims is different from the Anderson & Barr caisson. When attempted to be sunk, that caisson immediately began to veer; the current carried out the sands from under; it sank and assumed an angular position and could not be settled upon a level basis, and was a failure, as everybody, contractors included, agree.

Now, Captain Eells comes and proposes to load his particular structure to within 1 foot of the depth of the water at that point, to which it is to be floated from the place of construction, so that he will have only 1 foot additional in which to sink it, thereby hoping that he may have it land upon the bottom of the ocean when the vents are open so that it will rest equally throughout. Now, my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, on the committee suggested that no man of means would invest in such a "hare-brained," I think he called it, enterprise as what this must be conceded to be. But I take it that Captain Eells has faith in this project.

I take it from what has been whispered around that he has accumulated sufficient means to probably construct this caisson; but suppose he gets it there, and puts it in place, and then his means fail? It will surely be an obstruction to navigation, and almost as dangerous as a derelict, certainly as dangerous as a rock. What are you going to do with it? How are you going to get rid of him? He has unlimited time in which to proceed to the completion of this structure. He must begin construction within a year, but has unlimited time thereafter. How are you going to convince him, unless peradventure this base is so soft that the structure sinks out of sight, that his caisson, especially if submerged, is a dangerous menace and an obstacle to navigation there? Remember that your light-ship is several miles farther out to sea, and it is for that reason, as I understood, that Captain Hutchins claimed that it was a better guard to warn sailors of their position than a light-house would be, being that much farther out, and being that much more capable of observation by the passing vessels, and that in fair weather they run inside the light-ship at times.

Therefore we are not getting something of great advantage entirely for nothing and without peril of great damage; and supposing that this good man devotes his entire fortune to the enterprise and then finds, as he himself suspects, that this plan of the Light-House Board for a superstructure is going to cause the enterprise to be a failure, would it not be a most hard-hearted proceeding to entirely turn down all claim for reimbursement, even though he had voluntarily engaged upon an enterprise in defiance of the direct declaration of Congress that unless entire success attended it no claim should ever be made by him, his heirs, or assigns, or any of the persons who engaged in the enterprise?

Now, consider the position in which he puts himself. He evidently had a design of his own which might have had a reasonable basis and harmonious scheme. It is wiped out by the committee and the Light-House Board. He said, "I am at your service." He did not say, "Well, this is a project which has been carefully thought out, and when you change one part of it you must change everything else." He said, "I am entirely at your service." Without any regard to the additional cost which might be required to have a reasonably sensible venture entered upon, he expressed a readiness to accept any terms, any conditions which the committee or Congress might impose, and thereby showed his crude ideas of what is really involved. We want to do the best we can for the protection of that dangerous point, Mr. Speaker, but we want any venture which we license to be made there to be one which will help to secure and safeguard navigation, and not one which will put additional difficulties in the way of securing a safe and suitable light-house whenever a reasonable plan is submitted for the purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should not permit this opportunity to pass without saying at least a few words in my limited time in behalf of this exceedingly meritorious proposition to erect a light-house and fog signal on the outer portion of the shoals of Cape Hatteras, known as the "Diamond Shoal" on the North Carolina coast.

I represent, Mr. Speaker, in part, a coast district. This bill is asked for, as has been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], by the entire shipping interests of this country, and it is demanded generally by the seafaring people of the United States, whom I in part represent.

I do not think that any great stress should be laid upon the argument that heretofore there has been a failure to erect a light-house at this dangerous point on the Atlantic coast. Mr. Eells offers to try again this experiment, at no expense to the Government, and if after a period of five years it is a success, he is to be paid, otherwise he is not to receive a dollar.

Nothing can be more fair than this offer. The mere fact that heretofore an experiment has been tried to erect a light-house at the Diamond Shoal and failed should not affect the merits of this particular proposition.

There is not the least legal liability on the part of the Government. I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Minnesota, who oppose this bill, to point out what legal liability there is upon the part of the Government.

From my information and my reading of the committee report, there is absolutely not the slightest liability upon the part of the Government of the United States, unless at the end of five years the light-house is found to be in a permanent and satisfactory condition. At the end of this period, if satisfactory, Mr. Eells is to be paid $590,000; otherwise nothing. The Government can not hope to get a better proposition than that now made by Mr. Eells to erect a light-house at this point on Cape Hatteras, described by a former distinguished Senator from North Carolina, Matt W. Ransom, as "an ocean Blue Beard welcoming to the chambers of death the white-winged brides of the sea."

So far as light-ships are concerned, compared with the light-houses upon our coast, there can be no question that the light-house is by far the better proposition. A light-ship at this point, as has heretofore been stated in this debate, has drifted from its moorings, while the light-house, when erected, will be an enduring and permanent structure.

These two points have been clearly made in favor of this proposition: First, the absence of any liability upon the part of the Government; and second, the manifest superiority of the light-house over the light-ship.

Then Mr. Eells offers to construct this light-house without one penny of expenditure by the Government if there should be a failure; and besides the bill is demanded by the entire shipping interests of the country and by those who go down to the sea in ships.

I hope, therefore, that a decisive majority of this House will give their votes for this meritorious measure. [Loud applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor of introducing this bill in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and I have followed its course through the deliberations which the committee has given it up to the present time. I can, therefore, speak to some extent advisedly of its merits and the vicissitudes which it has undergone. I shall not, however, take up time now in any general discussion of this measure; but for those who desire to vote upon the question with information and advisedly, I shall address myself briefly to some of the arguments which have been made against it.

It has been said, in the first place, that the man with whom it is proposed to contract for the construction of this light station is lacking in professional experience and capacity, and that his personality does not commend itself to the consideration of Congress. As to the man's personal character, the estimation in which he is held by those who have his acquaintance, it is only necessary to refer to the report and the long list of names of gentlemen eminent in their respective avocations who testify to his reliability and his trustworthiness.

I shall ask leave to read only a brief citation from a letter of Mr. R. R. Fuller, of Boston, Mass., president of the Boston Marine Insurance Company and president of the Eastern Steamship Company:

> Having known the bearer, Captain Eells, for many years, I take pleasure in stating that I consider him well informed in matters pertaining to shipping and capable of accomplishing what he undertakes. I also consider him entirely trustworthy and reliable, and recommend him to the shipping interests as being thoroughly familiar with their needs.

As to the question of the professional skill of Captain Eells, it is proper to state that he has invented and has had patented a plan for constructing submarine foundations; that this patent has been submitted to certain eminent engineers throughout the country, and that they have given it their unqualified approval. Among those engineers are: L. L. Buck, of New York City; William D. H. Washington, president of the Hydraulic Construction Company, of New York City; Henry M. Robert, colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Theo. Cooper, an eminent engineer of New York City, and also Lewis Nixon, who has a wide reputation.

All of these men, well known in their respective positions, certify that they have examined the plans and specifications which have been patented by this man and that in their judgment they are eminently practicable and can be applied to the construction of submarine foundations at this dangerous place off Cape Hatteras on the coast of North Carolina, and that they believe the project is feasible. And, in addition, Capt. F. F. Wilde, United States Navy, and naval secretary of the Light-House Board in 1896, used this language concerning this project:

> There is no doubt in my mind of the eminent practicability of your scheme; to my mind it is not only far the best, but the only practical solution ever offered. The more I look into it the more I believe in it.

So that in the face of these testimonials it can not be successfully insisted upon this floor that this man does not commend himself in his personality and in his professional skill and capacity as able to construct this light station at this dangerous point.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] did what I conceived to be an injustice to the majority members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, although I feel sure his expressions were inadvertent. He stated that this project was chimerical and that it might result in the willful waste and expenditure of money. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HEPBURN], both in the last Congress and during this session, was chairman of the subcommittee which for weeks—in fact, for months—had this matter under consideration.

They conferred freely with the officers of the Light-House Board. They sought information from every source where they deemed it available. They framed this bill with the utmost care, with a view to the protection of the Government, consistent with what was best in the construction of this station, and the result of their labors is embodied in the substitute bill which they have presented to the House.

In addition to the chairman of the committee, there were as members of that subcommittee the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KYLE] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON]. It can not be said that any one of those gentlemen would indulge in any chimerical scheme. They have given it their earnest consideration. They believe it is a practicable project. They believe that they have thoroughly protected the Government.

It has been said that if this bill were to pass and this man should make a failure in constructing the light-house, a claim would be presented to Congress in some future year which might become an obligation. That is simply a bugaboo which is intended to frighten some Members of this House, but which I do not believe will subserve its purpose. That same argument might be directed to every contract which is let by any Department of this Government; they let contracts; the War Department, the Navy Department, the Department of Commerce and Labor, and the other Departments; and in many instances the contractors fail in the obligations of their contract. Yet the same reason would apply to any other Department of the Government that enters into contracts as would apply in this case to Congress entering into a contract with this man.

The committee have protected the Government, to use the language of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], by inserting the strongest language which they could possibly adopt for the protection of the United States. That is all they could do.

If this man shall fail—and those who have examined this project believe that he will succeed—and he should present any claim to Congress, this proviso, which is as strong as language can express it, will be a sufficient answer, and it will receive no consideration at the hands of any committee of this House or in the other branch of Congress.

This is a bill which ought to pass, and I do not believe to-day there has been any substantial objection presented which should prevent any Member from giving it his favorable support. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 134, noes 35.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MAINTENANCE OF RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill H. R. 14754, with Senate amendments disagreed to by the House, and on which the Senate insists on its amendments.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the request of the Senate for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees Mr. BURTON, Mr. DOVENER, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS, EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 15228) establishing a regular term of the United States circuit and district courts at East St. Louis, Ill., with a Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANT APPRAISER AT THE PORT OF BOSTON.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4955.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4955) to provide for the appointment of an additional assistant appraiser at the port of Boston.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an additional assistant appraiser at the port of Boston, State of Massachusetts, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at a salary not exceeding $2,500 per annum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCCALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ALASKA DELEGATE BILL.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13356, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate on that bill be closed in thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13356, the Alaska Delegate bill, with Mr. PERKINS in the chair.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER].

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Chairman, at the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress I introduced a bill providing for the erection of a statue to John Paul Jones. The bill was favorably reported from the Committee on the Library, but no action was had in the House. At the beginning of this session I introduced the same bill, which had been again reported favorably. A similar bill has passed the Senate.

John Paul Jones was the true founder of the American Navy, and few men in all our history have rendered more glorious and important services for the country than he, and the memory of none has been more neglected by our Government.

Statues are being erected at the expense of the Government in honor of men whose services were incomparably less valuable to the country than his, and the time has come when this bill should pass.

John Paul Jones was the youngest of four sons of John Paul, a Scottish peasant, born near the fishing hamlet of Arbigland, in the western lowlands. William Paul, the oldest son, was adopted in 1743 by William Jones, a Virginia planter and a distant relative, and by virtue of the adoption took the name of William Paul Jones. John Paul, jr., who was born in 1747, made his first voyage to America in 1759, when 12 years of age.

He was a sailor at the age of 13, a mate at the age of 17, and a captain of a full-rigged ship at the age of 21. Self-educated, he early mastered the French and Spanish languages, and by the time he reached the age of 27 no man in the British naval service of his age was better educated or more accomplished than he.

In 1773 William Paul Jones died without issue, and under the terms of the will of William Jones, John Paul became heir to a large Virginia estate and took the name of John Paul Jones. He gave up his ship and settled down to the life of a Virginia planter. His plantation contained some 3,000 acres and was situated on the Rappahannock River.

He soon made the acquaintance and became the friend of Thomas Jefferson and George Washington.

In January, 1775, he wrote Washington that war must soon break out between Great Britain and the colonies and that his services were at the disposal of the colonies, and in April of the same year he wrote Jefferson "that nothing now is or possibly can be in store except war to the knife or total submission to complete slavery" and that provisions for armament by land and by sea must be made at once.

Paul Jones was the true founder of the American Navy, as he was the first man to fly an American flag on a regular man-of-war, the first man to receive for the Stars and Stripes a foreign naval salute, and the first flying that flag to compel the surrender of a British man-of-war.

On June 10, 1775, the Continental Congress appointed a naval committee, and on June 24 the committee invited John Paul Jones, of Virginia, "to lay before the committee such information as may seem to him useful in assisting the committee to discharge its labors." In response to the invitation, Jones hurried to Philadelphia. He was called by the committee to give his ideas upon two subjects: First, "The proper qualifications of naval officers;" second, "The kind or kinds of armed vessels most desirable for the service of the United Colonies, keeping in view the limited resources of the Congress."

John Paul Jones was also asked by Congress to act as a member of a committee to survey and report upon the condition and the expediency of purchasing certain vessels then in the Delaware. Jones at once assumed the head of the commission, did a great amount of valuable work, had nearly all of his recommendations adopted, and, besides all this, directed and superintended the work of converting the purchased ships into war vessels and equipping them for sea. It was while doing all this work that he wrote his reports on naval personnel and matériel. These reports are among the ablest reports ever made to an American Congress, and rank with Hamilton's famous report on manufactures.

In his report upon the naval personnel he has said the last word on that subject that can be said, and the ideas therein expressed are as vital and fundamental to-day as when penned more than one hundred and twenty-eight years ago.

Washington read these reports before they were laid before the committee, and said:

Mr. Jones is clearly not only a master mariner within the scope of navigation, but he also holds a strong and profound sense of the political and military weight of command on the sea. His powers of usefulness are great and must be constantly kept in view.

Paul Jones was at this time about 28 years of age. As to his report on the naval matériel, it is enough to say that his reports were adopted, and the new Navy constructed in accordance with his views. Is it an exaggeration to say that he founded the American Navy?

He was promised the captaincy of one of the new ships, but the influence of John Adams was then paramount, and of the five places Adams secured four for New England, the other going to Pennsylvania. Paul Jones was made a lieutenant. It was expected that he would protest against this injustice, but he only said:

I am here to serve the cause of human rights, not to promote the fortunes of Paul Jones. If by devotion to the one I can secure the other, well and good; but if either must wait, let it be my fortune.

The captain of the ship Alfred, to which Jones was assigned as lieutenant, had not yet arrived from Boston, and John Hancock detailed Lieutenant Jones to take temporary command, and as acting captain he flung out the pine tree and rattlesnake flag—the first American flag ever shown on a man-of-war.

On May 10, 1776, Jones received his first independent command, that of the Providence, sloop of war, 14 guns and 107 men.

He made a daring and successful raid on English commerce, capturing and destroying sixteen vessels.

He then took command of the Alfred, and in thirty-three days captured seven ships. These prizes were of great value to the cause, since two were loaded with quartermaster's supplies for the English troops—among other things, 10,000 complete uniforms, including great coats, boots, socks, and woolen shirts; 7,000 pairs of blankets; 1,400 tents; 600 saddles and complete cavalry equipments; 1,700,000 rounds of fixed ammunition; medical stores and 40 cases of surgical instruments, "all priceless and unattainable by any other means." Another of the ships had 1,700 fur overcoats, 11,000 pairs of blankets, 1,000 muskets, and 2 complete batteries of horse artillery.

After this cruise Jones was ordered to Philadelphia for duty with the board of advice to the committee, and remained there until the summer of 1777.

Jones was all the time urging Congress to give him a ship or a squadron to show our flag and demonstrate our existence in European seas. A new sloop of war, to be called the Ranger, had just been launched at Portsmouth, N. H., and on June 17, 1777, Congress passed a resolution providing—

That the flag should be the Stars and Stripes, and that John Paul Jones be appointed to command the Ranger.

Jones used to say:

That flag and I are twins, born the same hour from the same womb of destiny; we can not be parted in life or in death.

At midnight, October 31, 1777, Jones on the Ranger sailed from Portsmouth for France, carrying the news that Burgoyne had surrendered. Leaving France with the Ranger, he sailed for the Irish Channel. At midnight, October 22, 1778, he was off the port of White Haven. Taking twenty sailors and three officers in boats he seized the two small forts, from which the coast guards fled. Fires were kindled on several ships, but as British troops were rallying from all directions it was necessary to make an immediate retreat. The amount of shipping actually destroyed was limited to one vessel, but the moral effect was great and far-reaching. The British were compelled to spend great sums to fortify harbors, and insurance rates were doubled. Senator HOAR has said that more than anything else high marine-insurance rates compelled England to grant our independence.

The next landing was at St. Marys Isle, at the castle of the Earl of Selkirk. It has often been alleged that Jones acted as a buccaneer on this occasion and looted the castle. The sailors did take away some silver plate, but Jones purchased it all of his sailors, paying out of his own pocket for it £140, and returned it uninjured to the earl.

On April 24 Jones fought the sloop of war Drake, twenty guns against the Ranger's eighteen, and after a furious fight the Drake surrendered. Not a great battle, perhaps, and yet Jones had done what no other man had done for a century—compelled an English man-of-war to surrender to a ship of equal, even inferior, force. Fifteen officers on the Ranger were from New Hampshire, and 30 per cent of the crew were from that State, a crew which Jones pronounced the best crew he had ever seen.

In 1779 Jones was given the command of the Bon Homme Richard, and on September 23 of that year he met the new and powerful English frigate Serapis, which he captured after the most remarkable naval duel ever yet fought.

There was no more gallant officer in the English navy than Richard Pearson, the captain of the Serapis. The fight began after dark, but the sky was clear, and there was a full moon. The surgeon of the Serapis said that Pearson examined the stranger through his night glass and said: "The stranger is probably Paul Jones, and if so there is work ahead." The vessels slowly drew together, and not a shot was fired until they were within 600 feet. The Serapis was one of the best new ships in the English navy, while the Bon Homme Richard was an old merchantman made over into a war ship. The armament of the Serapis was far better and heavier, and it soon became evident to Jones that the only way he could win was to foul and grapple the Serapis and board her. In spite of the utmost efforts of the Englishman, Jones succeeded in doing this. Jones had another ship with him, the Alliance, commanded by a cowardly and treacherous Frenchman, but he not only received no aid from her, but twice during the fight she drew up near enough to fire a broadside, not into the Serapis, but into the Bon Homme Richard, and then ran away.

When Jones finally grappled the Serapis the main batteries of the Bon Homme Richard had been silenced and she was beginning to sink. Jones with his own hands lashed the ships together. Quite a number of the sailors and all of the marines on the Bon Homme Richard were French. The marines lost heart, when, as one of them said, "Jones sprung among the shaking men like a tiger among calves." The undaunted and unconquerable spirit of the captain filled every soul, and everyone became as much of a hero as himself. Believing that the ship was sinking and the fight lost, the chief gunner cried for quarter.

Captain Pearson, of the Serapis, testified before the English court-martial. He said he hailed to ask Jones if he surrendered, and the reply was to the effect that he had only just begun to fight. Captain Pearson said:

At first I thought this was mere bravado, but I soon discovered that it was the defiance of a man desperate enough, if he could not conquer, to sink in his ship alongside.

Just at the time the gunner cried for quarter Burbank, the master-at-arms, released some 200 sailors whom Jones had as prisoners. Jones snapped his pistol in Burbank's face, but he missed fire, and he then felled the master-at-arms by a blow on the head, and with a few men held the prisoners in check and forced them to man the pumps. Jones's ship was now on fire and with 5 feet of water in the hold. The English batteries were blowing to pieces everything below deck, but Jones's marines with muskets swept the upper deck of the Serapis, and no Englishman could live there.

In an instant and by the act of one man an almost hopeless situation was changed into a complete victory. A common sailor serving as a volunteer—George Roberts, of Middletown, N. H.—with a handful of hand grenades ran out on the main yardarm of the Bon Homme Richard which projected over the deck of the Serapis. Under a rain of bullets he finally succeeded in dropping a hand grenade through the after-hatchway and upon the gun deck of the English vessel, where lay a quantity of ammunition. A frightful explosion followed, which killed and wounded many men, and in an instant Jones ordered his men to board the Serapis, fought the English to a finish in a hand-to-hand struggle, and Pearson surrendered.

The English commander found it impossible to haul down his colors. No Englishman would go aloft to take them down, as some musket shots were still being exchanged between the vessels. George Roberts jumped aboard the English ship, climbed the shrouds, and hacked down the flag, which, caught by a puff of wind as it fell, spread out at Jones's feet, covering the body of Lieutenant Grubb, who was lying dead upon the deck.

The most marvelous sea fight ever fought was won. Jones, in a sinking ship, transferred his men to the Serapis as his own ship went down. He left the flag—made by the girls of Portsmouth, N. H., from their silk dresses—flying on the ship, so as he said:

The last ever seen of the Bon Homme Richard was the defiant waving of her unconquered and unstricken flag.

I could not bear—

He afterwards said to Miss Langdon, of Portsmouth—

I could not bear to strip it from the old ship in her last agony, nor could I deny to my dead on her deck, who had given their lives to keep it flying, the glory of taking it with them.

On the Bon Homme Richard, of 323 men, 67 were killed and 106 badly wounded. On the Serapis, of 317 men, 87 were killed and 134 badly wounded, many fatally.

Jones took the captured ship to the port of Texel, in Holland, and Sir Joseph Yorke, the British minister, demanded the surrender of Jones and his men as pirates. Jones replied in a letter of remarkable power, and so good an authority as Horace Walpole thought that the advantage was clearly with Jones and that the British minister was overmatched in this diplomatic duel. There was no more talk of pirates or of a surrender of Jones and his men to the English.

The people of Holland at that time were divided into two political camps, one favoring the English and the other the Americans. Jones persisted in staying at Texel, in spite of the demand of the English minister that he should be ordered to depart, and by his presence and conduct inspired and strengthened the friends of America and strained the relations of England and Holland past mending.

On December 17, 1779, Jones wrote a friend that war would be declared between England and Holland within a year, and war was declared December 19, 1780, and the first charge brought against Holland in England's declarations was that Paul Jones had been permitted to remain for weeks in one of the ports. A fleet of seven English ships lay off the coast waiting to attack Jones when he should be forced out, but, a storm coming up, the fleet was driven off and Jones sailed out, regarding the storm, in the words of the British minister, only as a "fair sailing wind." As he flew down the English Channel he passed so close to the great channel fleet anchored off Spithead that he fired a shot into it.

It is impossible to follow in detail his all too brief career. On March 28, 1781, he received the thanks of Congress in a resolution couched in the most flattering words. He was decorated by Louis XVI and granted the title of chevalier. In December, 1787, Paul Jones again went back to Portsmouth, N. H., to take charge of the construction of a 74-gun ship, to be called the America, and remained there nearly a year.

In 1787, at the suggestion of Jefferson, he took service as rear-admiral in the Russian navy, stating that in so doing he would never renounce the glorious title of a citizen of the United States. He rendered distinguished service in command of the Black Sea fleet in the war then raging between Russia and Turkey, but the service was unsatisfactory owing to the jealousy of Russian officers, and although promoted by Catherine to the position of vice-admiral, he resigned from her service in 1791 and returned to Paris.

The French Assembly had determined to reorganize the French navy on republican lines. Jones wrote and published a pamphlet on the French navy, which, after his death, was ordered reprinted by Napoleon. It was his hope to have high command in the new French navy. Horace Walpole, after reading the pamphlet, wrote Jones a congratulatory note, but begged him not to take service with France. Walpole advised him to go home to America and rest on his laurels, or "come to England, where, if you need more money than you have, your friends here will take pleasure in finding it for you, for the sake of your society and your table talk." "Great," wrote Walpole, "as you have shown yourself in war, those intimately acquainted with you know that you are equally masterful in affairs of commerce."

Jones's health had been failing for some years, and on July 18, 1792, he died, aged about 45 years. The French Assembly ordered a public funeral and paid all possible respect to his memory.

In 1805 Napoleon, speaking with Berthier after Trafalgar, asked, "How old was Paul Jones when he died?" Berthier said he thought he was about 45. "Then," said Napoleon, "he did not fulfill his destiny. Had he lived to this time France might have had an admiral." At another time Napoleon spoke of Paul Jones and Nelson, saying, "It is a pity they could not have been matched somewhere with fairly equal force."

After the close of the Revolutionary war Jones often visited England, and by none was he more cordially received, more admired and respected than by the officers of the British navy.

Many people seem to think that Paul Jones was a rough privateer. Nothing could be more untrue. He was a gentleman to his finger tips and a profound student. As to privateering, he would never have anything to do with it, although every possible pecuniary inducement was held out to him to engage in it.

No abler, braver, more patriotic, more brilliant, more successful, more modest, and unselfish man ever sailed or fought a ship. He was a man who took high rank on account of his attainments, his character, and his manner in the most aristocratic as well as the most polite courts in Europe. A man who was admitted to an intimacy with the best and greatest of France, such as has never been accorded an American since. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HOGG].

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman, public attention having been called in so direct a manner, both by efforts in and out of Congress, as well as by the public press, to the administration of our laws touching the disposition of the public domain, and so much having been urged against the further continuance of our present policy with reference thereto, it has seemed well for me to ask your indulgence that I might, in as brief a manner as possible, meet at least some of the allegations so frequently made on the part of those who seek to overthrow the very salutary measures that have for so many years conduced in so marked a degree to the development of our western domain. One might well imagine that after such splendid results had been achieved under the influence of these laws none would be so rash or inconsiderate as to wish to amend or even in the slightest degree seek to modify or impair them.

When we contemplate the stupendous fact that within less than fifty years we have builded an empire in the West covering a territory of more than one and a half million square miles in extent, and containing a population of more than 8,000,000 people, with unbounded wealth and with natural resources as yet almost untouched, and when we further consider that one of the most potent factors in this great advancement has been the wise and generous provisions made by Congress in the past for the settlement of these then public lands, we may well hesitate before we shall be induced to repeal them. So far as the homestead act is concerned, there seems to be no disposition to change or modify its provisions save, perhaps, as to the commutation clause or the right to pay for the land held thereunder by the settler, thereby avoiding the necessity of continuous residence upon the land held by virtue of this provision.

Some objection is made to the right of commutation on the ground that it tends to lessen the number of home builders and is used as a means to acquire large tracts of land in the hands of the few. I think that the objection is more imaginary, however, than real. The ability of those of large means to become possessed of considerable areas of land has always been recognized, and will probably always exist so long as lands are alienable and the purchaser possesses the means to acquire them, and this will be the case whether the title to Government lands may be had in one or five years.

While it must be conceded that the purpose of the Government is and should be to provide homes for the homeless, and the acquirement of large tracts in the hands of the few should, as a rule, be discouraged, still it will be difficult to find, except possibly in a very few cases, any great harm experienced from this provision.

Indeed, in many instances it has been a means of very considerable benefit to the poor man, whose condition we must agree should be our particular care. It is not an imaginary case, but one of very frequent occurrence, that the settler, having acquired his homestead right, is unable to proceed with the improvement of his home for lack of funds. Money is needed for stock or buildings or other necessities, and so, with the provision for making cash entry, he is enabled frequently to raise sufficient funds by loan upon the land to tide him over and make it possible to improve his home, cultivate his land, and at once place his property in a condition of profitable production.

It will be admitted that frequently "the borrower becomes servant to the lender" as of old, but as a rule the man of industry and the usual amount of good sense, so essential to success, will soon discharge his indebtedness and will have been well repaid for his venture.

Again, it is a well-known fact that many persons avail themselves of the homestead right who, before the expiration of the five years, are desirous of engaging in other business, or for one reason or another find it desirable to dispose of their holdings. If this right did not exist they might be put to very considerable loss if they could not get immediate title to their lands and through this means dispose of the same.

I believe, therefore, that the objection is not well founded either in fact or in theory, and that this right having been exercised for so many years without any considerable abuse is sufficient guaranty that it may be continued without any great danger to the settlement of the public domain, nor lessen to any appreciable degree the number of home builders. One of the significant facts in connection with the enactment of our land laws is that they have been supplemented by additional provisions and enactments to suit the changing conditions, and more particularly as to the regions to be affected by them.

The homestead and preemption entries were generally sufficient to meet the requirements of the prairie regions, and so, with the exception of the timber-culture law, Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas were settled under these provisions. As to the timber-culture law, it must be admitted, I think, that it was wholly visionary and utterly useless for the purposes intended. It is not the first, nor do I suppose it will be the last, time that the theories of well-meaning men have failed upon a practical test.

No one traveling over the plains of Kansas or Nebraska would ever dream that such a law had been in force in these regions. Yet great hopes were entertained that immense forests would grow upon these barren plains. In these later days the forest crank or dreamer has moved still farther west and is busily engaged in exploiting his theories upon an unsuspecting, though long suffering, people of the mountain region.

Another law passed to meet new conditions is the desert-land act. This law was primarily intended to apply in the arid region where irrigation is possible, and as an inducement to secure the settlement and reclamation of these lands at first 640 acres were allowed to each person, and later 320 acres. These lands are held by the payment of 25 cents per acre at the date of location, the expenditure of $1 per acre per year for three years in applying water upon the same for the irrigation of the entire tract, and the final payment of $1 per acre to the Government when title passes. Under the wise provisions of this act large areas have been brought under successful cultivation, but this, too, seems to meet the general censure of the gentlemen engaged in the task of making public lands difficult of acquisition.

The principal objection to this law seems to be that residence is not a requirement in obtaining title. Now, as to this objection, it must be borne in mind that one of the principal difficulties in the enforcement of the homestead laws is the lack of sufficient residence or cultivation of the land. Men will locate lands and, owing to poverty, sickness, and one thing or another, are unable to strictly comply with the law. Unfortunately there are many men with families desirous of obtaining homes upon the public domain who are compelled to work day by day for their sustenance. They have little or no money laid by, the use of which might afford them an opportunity to perform the necessary acts to secure a homestead right, either by residence or cultivation of their lands. Now, it must appear plain that to such the desert-land act affords a means to secure a home without residence thereon, and still continue their labors elsewhere. To such persons this provision is of more than ordinary value.

Again, there are men with the money to invest who are willing to venture somewhat in the enterprise of putting water upon this land. So the result frequently is that the poor man is able to get the water applied upon his land through the funds of another, and is then able with little cost to him to have a home of his own by deeding a portion of his land to his more fortunate neighbor who has the necessary funds to enable him to comply with the law. I know of no provision of our laws governing the acquisition of public lands that may be more the means of so much benefit to the man of little or no means than this.

But it is claimed that because this means of acquiring lands exists it will work great harm to the project of reclaiming the arid regions by the Government. I would be the last person to knowingly advocate any measure that would in the least hinder the Government in the great purpose of reclaiming the arid lands of our country. I know of no other measure that, in my judgment, means so much for the people, that can be made so effective in developing the intermountain country as this. Still, I can see no good reason for repealing a law that has been found so fruitful of good in the past, or promises so much to the man who really should be the object of our care.

The Government is fully protected by the right of withdrawal from entry lands that may be irrigated by the Government, under such provisions as it may see fit to adopt. It must be remembered that ordinarily the Government does not seek to reclaim lands that may be reclaimed by private enterprise. So far it seems to be the purpose of the Government only to undertake such projects as are beyond the capacity of the people to accomplish. So in Colorado we find the Government engaged in tunneling a mountain to bring the Gunnison River into the Uncompahgre Valley, a wonderful undertaking, and, when accomplished, will be a perpetual monument to the wisdom of the Government as well as to the ability of its engineers in charge. The reclamation of the Salt River Valley in Arizona is another illustration of the great things we are doing along this line of developing a portion of our country and making it fit for the homes of thousands of our people. But these enterprises, great and beneficial as they are, in no wise conflict with the man who, with a few dollars, reclaims a portion of the public domain in places where the Government would not care to go. And so we say, let him alone. Give him a chance by his own efforts to make himself a home. You can get no better citizen than he who has energy, self-reliance, and pluck enough to cause him to go upon the desert and reclaim the land that the Government ought to give him. There being such an effort to repeal this very salutary law, let us see what has been done under it for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

In the State of Colorado during that year there were 92,077.44 acres entered under the desert-land act to 516,210.11 acres under the homestead law, while there were for the same period 11,634.69 final entries for desert land as against 130,357.11 acres.

In Arizona there were 5,159.29 acres original entries under the desert-land act, and 66,639.37 acres original homestead entries; in New Mexico, 76,545.97 acres as against 516,831.31; in Wyoming, 136,896.74 as against 265,354.83, in Montana, 416,214.16 acres as against 388,554.94; in Oregon, 66,524.28 as against 832,473.29; in Washington, 56,509.57 as against 799,971.61; in Idaho, 74,239.83 as against 337,376.30, and in California, 77,570.21 as against 300,968.98 acres.

When we consider that in homestead entries the Government receives nothing unless there should be a commutation, and in the case of desert entries there must be paid the sum of $1.25 per acre in addition to the expenditure of $3 per acre in applying water for the purpose of irrigation, we can easily conclude what a wonderful impetus this class of settlement must give to the reclamation of our desert and arid regions and the consequent benefit that arises from the settlement and improvement of the same.

In the intermountain States and Territories another factor must be borne in mind, and one which it is hard to overestimate in arriving at a just conclusion touching the real conditions that embrace the prosperity and well-being of those regions, and that is the cattle and sheep industries that flourished for so many years. While the ranges were free for the grazing of cattle and sheep no especial hardship was encountered in those industries; but when through causes that I shall advert to hereafter these ranges became more and more restricted, it became absolutely necessary and essential that feed should be furnished by the ranches in the valleys; and so year by year there has come an ever-increasing demand for lands suitable for this purpose. During the year 1900 there were in Colorado exceeding a million and a quarter cattle and exceeding that number of sheep, all dependent more or less upon these ranges for their support. It is easy to see, therefore, the prime necessity for the increase in acreage of arable lands. To a large degree, we believe, the wise provision for the entry of desert lands has contributed and will continue to contribute to the maintenance, if not the further increase, of these great industries.

There is another method of acquiring title to Government lands that it appears is not satisfactory to some. I refer to the timber and stone act. It is alleged with possibly some degree of truth that this class of entry is subject to great fraud upon the Government, and so it is sought to repeal this act. The timber and stone act was not the result of caprice nor of misadventure. It was without question the result of necessity. The merest casual examination of the conditions which it was intended to meet and still meets will fully justify its enactment, and we insist still justifies its continuance.

In the settlement of a new country necessarily there is and must be a very considerable demand for lumber for building and other purposes. The settlement of the mountain regions presented and still presents a peculiar condition, one not existing in the settlement of the Plains country. Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas had no supply of timber within their own territory, and so they were compelled to draw upon Chicago and other eastern and northern markets for their supply. Colorado and other mountain States were differently situated. They had timber at their doors ready to be turned into lumber for the supply of a rapidly increasing demand. The more rapidly these States became settled the greater the demand and the more urgent the necessity that some means should be devised that the great resources of timber at hand might be utilized for the upbuilding of these communities. Why should these natural resources not be utilized? Are there valuable mines of gold and silver, develop them. Are there great fields of coal, open them. Are there deposits of iron, work them. Bring forth by your labor and capital all these great natural resources as you would plant your fields and orchards.

And so we say of the timber; make it a source of wealth by your industry. Give employment to labor; make it possible for capital to expect at least a moderate profit. It is true a tree looks more beautiful standing in the forest than it does in a pile of lumber, but it is not so useful. Now, what of the result so much desired by those who wish the repeal of this law? It must of necessity mean that there will be less lumber manufactured, or else the repeal would be of no avail. With less production, the demand remaining, some other source of supply must be obtained. Take for illustration the State of Colorado. Lessen the possibility of supply from our own forests and we must go either to Chicago, San Francisco, or Texas, and in any event the price of lumber must be more than doubled to the consumer. And this, too, with a supply at hand. "Carrying coals to Newcastle" would be wise in comparison. So far as Colorado and like sections are concerned, no harm can come from this law. None has come, and we believe for years to come no harm can come. As to California, Oregon, and Washington, so far as these States are concerned, it may be possible that the price per acre is too small under the present law. But why place us under the ban because, perhaps, some wrong is done in these other States? We need our timber for our own use, and the price is sufficiently high, considering the difficulty of securing it in the mountains of Colorado and the expensive plants necessary for its manufacture. If there are inequalities in the working of the law, adjust these inequalities, but do not destroy the benefits accruing under the law to our people.

It becomes a matter of the very gravest concern as to the lumber supply the country over. In the northern pineries already we are beginning to anticipate a very considerable shortage. In the West—that is, the Pacific coast area—only a partial relief can be had owing to the fact of extremely high transportation charges, and the amount produced elsewhere is of such limited quantity that but little can be expected to meet the growing demand that must necessarily come from increased use all over the country. The demand, therefore, remaining the same, or, we may fairly conjecture, increased, production must keep an even pace or else a shortage must be occasioned requiring the importation of lumber from the outside. If the theories of these timber misers shall be followed we are to be confronted by a shortage of domestic lumber and a consequent increase of importation. Just what the result of this will be on the varied industries dependent directly or indirectly upon the use of lumber may readily be imagined.

As a remedy for the deforestation of our timbered areas we have at last a solution which may well challenge our attention. By an act of Congress of date March 3, 1891, the President of the United States was authorized from time to time to set apart and reserve certain lands as public timber reservations, which act was amended June 4, 1897, making provisions in a manner for the regulation of these reservations, and specifying somewhat how the same may be used by the settlers and others residing in the vicinity of such reservations. To these general provisions was added certain authority to the Secretary of the Interior to make such other rules and regulations as might be necessary for carrying out the general purposes of the act. Under the terms of these acts I imagine it was never dreamed that the President or his Secretary of the Interior would seek to practically overturn the public-land laws in the mountain States and Territories. That such has been the result I shall attempt to make plain. By the terms of the act under which these reservations are authorized it is provided that "No public forest reservation shall be established except to improve and protect the forest within the reservation, or for the purpose of securing favorable conditions of water flows, and to furnish a continuous supply of timber for the use and necessities of citizens of the United States;" but it is not the purpose or intent of these provisions, or of the act providing for such reservations, to authorize the inclusion therein of lands more valuable for the mineral therein or for agricultural purposes than for forest purposes.

We see, then, that under the provisions of these acts the purpose was to secure the flow of water and the continuous supply of timber for the use and necessities of the citizens. Nor was it ever intended that any limitation should be placed upon the acquisition of mineral or agricultural lands so long as any portion of these reserves was valuable for such purposes. But what has been done under these enactments? In the State of Colorado more than 4,000,000 acres have been withdrawn from public settlement under the various acts relating thereto, and new and largely increased areas are rapidly being placed within the reserves. In the Western States and Territories more than 100,000 square miles have been placed within the forest reserves, an area but little short of the entire territory of all the New England States, New York included.

The area included in the reserves in the State of Colorado alone is about equal to the entire State of Massachusetts, and while it is no doubt true that very much of this area is unfitted for agriculture, yet a very considerable portion is valuable for such uses and is capable of furnishing homes for a great many people.

The experience of the past few years has shown that at altitudes as great as 8,500 feet ranches have been located that have paid the owners handsome returns and, as a matter of fact, are more profitable than like acreage in the lower valleys. Indeed, in somewhat favored localities good crops of hay and grain have been raised with little or no irrigation whatever. It becomes, therefore, a very grave and important question as to the exercise of this authority so unwisely placed in the hands of the Executive—unwise in this, that so much of the public domain intended for the use and occupation of the people should be administered by a Department that of necessity can and, as a matter of fact, does know so little of the situation surrounding any particular reservation. Can it be expected that the Secretary of the Interior, or even some subordinate sitting in his office in the city of Washington, can be correctly informed of the character of lands contained within a reservation situated two or three thousand miles away?

Of course we all know, at least those of us who have had dealings with this Department, that it is an extremely difficult undertaking to make any of these gentlemen admit that they don't know everything about the matter or even to admit that they may be mistaken. They look at their maps and they see a mountain range marked thereon and know beyond any question that that country is just the kind of country to put in a forest reserve. So it is done. They tell us temporarily until they can send out their inspectors and get a report. It makes little difference to the Department what harm they may do to enterprises within the territory in the meantime.

No difference to them if men have undertaken to reclaim portions of the public domain, are constructing systems of irrigation, building sawmills for the manufacture of lumber, so much needed in the various developments of the country; that men have embarked in the cattle or sheep business and have invested hundreds of thousands of dollars supposing that the public range would be open to them as it had been for years. All these enterprises involving so much, the capital and labor of the country, must come to a standstill until some inspector can make an examination of the area reserved, make his report, and possibly in the lapse of time have his report acted upon in Washington. I do not believe Congress ever contemplated that this great wrong should be done the people who are fast settling upon the Government domain. Nor do I believe it was ever the intention of Congress that the laws of the country should be held for naught, and that the public domain should be placed in the hands of one man or set of men to the great and apparently irremedial injury of the people.

Now, as to the purposes in establishing these reserves. It is claimed on the part of the so-called "experts" of the Government that the growth of timber causes the retention of the winter's snows and therefore results in a supply of water in the later months for irrigation, and that this is so at altitudes of even less than 6,000 feet. And it is largely for the purpose of supplying irrigation in the later months that the reserves are established. In reply to this I wish to suggest that in the mountain regions where these vast reserves are being established, ordinarily beginning in April, the streams begin to increase their flow and reach their maximum from the 1st to the 10th of June. After that period they gradually diminish, and ordinarily there is a shortage of water about the middle of July, the matter of shortage necessarily being measured by the ordinary water supply taken in connection with the acreage sought to be irrigated. Taking the large streams, such as the Grand and the Gunnison in western Colorado, there is never a shortage, for the reason that the supply is far in excess of the acreage capable of irrigation. It is largely in connection with the smaller streams that the question of supply becomes important. Now, I assert, what everyone who has actual experience in such matters knows, that at least three-fourths of all the water supply in the later months comes from the snows above the timber line, and in fact almost the entire supply.

The reason is apparent. The heaviest snowfall is about the mountain peaks. This causes vast bodies of snow to break away from their moorings and rush down into the gulches with terrific force, piling up the snow to great depths and causing it to solidify, becoming almost as hard as ice.

These vast masses remain in the gulches until late in the summer, and indeed some remain the year round, and furnish a constant flow of water. Then we find upon exposed places, where the wind can have full sway, great drifts of snow are piled up, and these furnish their proportion of the water supply. The mountains themselves are great reservoirs fed by melting snows through their crevices, and pouring out their garnered store through springs lower down their sides. When there is scant fall of snow high up in the mountains, or if the fall comes late, say in February and afterwards, there is always a diminished flow in the streams in the summer months, and almost always a shortage of water in the valleys for irrigation.

Now, what of the effect of forests in supplementing this supply? As a matter of fact, and I care not what the Government professors may say to the contrary, any forest below 8,000 feet can and does affect the later supply in no degree whatever.

Below this altitude the snow has entirely disappeared by the middle of May, and when the streams have begun to diminish, about the middle of June, there is no water flowing from these forest lands, the only water flowing through them coming from the snow masses lying above and through springs fed by them. Even in the forests above and extending to timber line in ordinary seasons the snow has disappeared before the period of shortage. These are facts known to every man who has lived in the mountain region any length of time, and still we find the Government blindly, foolishly reaching out and taking in vast areas for the futile purpose of conserving the water supply, embracing areas upon which there is not a stick of timber and, so far as we can tell, never has been. Rich agricultural lands, the finest of grazing lands, timber matured and valuable for commercial purposes, and even towns of more than 5,000 people have been included within these reservations. No one within sight of timber is safe from the hand of the forest-reserve department.

It would be apparently the part of wisdom to carefully examine the land before the Department interferes in so grave a matter with the rights of citizens to the public domain in establishing its reserves. But no, they evidently take their map and fix their reserves, or possibly they send out some inspector to spy out the land like Moses of old. What the ordinary Government inspector can see in the time allotted him, or what he really knows after seeing, is a matter that it might be well to pass by without comment. The excuse made by the Department in establishing these ill-advised temporary withdrawals seems remarkable to one who is at all conversant with the real situation. The Department alleges as its reason for this sort of action that if it became known that the Government was about to establish a forest reserve and some person found it out he might get in the way and locate some land.

Well, why not, if the land is of such character as to warrant location? Is it true that the men of the West, whose enterprise and courage and daring have made possible that great empire, are nothing but sc emers, if not thieves and rogues? Is it true that all of honesty and patriotism and virtue is to be found only in the Departments at Washington, and because a citizen seeks to avail himself of his rights and seeks to better his condition by making entry of public lands he must be treated as though he was doing some act that made him an object of suspicion? But there is another matter connected with these reserves that it seems to me merits some attention. It is said these reserves must be established to furnish a continuous supply of timber for the use and necessities of the citizens.

Now, the Department seems to have interpreted this to mean that in order to have this continuous supply you must not use the timber at all; that is to say, "We will let you cut timber from the reserves under certain rules and regulations that we shall adopt." And this brings me to the principal question, viz, the administration of the forest reserves.

If these reserves have been recklessly established, withdrawn without regard to the interests of the people and of but little avail for the purposes intended, it would seem that the administration of them has been even more remarkable. To such an extent have the rules governing this Department gone that it has been deemed wise that some legislation be had removing some of the barriers raised by the Department to the entry of agricultural lands, and so we find the act of the present session providing for the entry of such lands under certain restrictions, and we think eventually there must be other and additional legislation to prevent, as far as possible, the hindrances to the fullest settlement of these reserves by the home seeker or other person who desires to use the reserves for some beneficial purpose.

Now, what of the effect of existing rulings with regard to the various industries of particularly the mountain regions? The present law recognizes the right to locate and operate mines within the reserve. To do this successfully the utmost liberty should be had to go upon the reserve with the necessary appliances, to fix a residence convenient for carrying on the work of prospecting, the use of timber for fuel, as well as the free use of water, and the right to graze at least some stock. This sort of work necessarily requires the passing over and exploration of considerable areas and the frequent moving and establishment of camps.

To say that these matters shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, who through a misapprehension of the conditions or requirements of the business may render it impossible to carry on this enterprise, is to say that practically the business shall not be carried on at all. But the inconvenience and hardship that may be encountered in prospecting for mines is but small in comparison with the obstacles to be met with in the operation of mines. Nine times out of ten when valuable mineral has been discovered it is absolutely a matter of necessity that mills should be erected, mill sites located, roads built, tramways erected, water diverted, tailings taken care of, timber secured, buildings erected, fuel had, and any number of other things so essential to the business. All of these things only to be had under rules and regulations of the Secretary or some underling, possibly in some measure under the discretion of some forest ranger or inspector who cares more for his job than the inconvenience he may occasion some great enterprise that in the very nature of things must employ many hundreds of men. No road can be built until permission be had from Washington, and then under bond. No timber can be used until permission from Washington be had, and then only in limited quantities. No ditch can be dug or water used until a like permission is had. Even timber growing on one claim can not be used upon another unless contiguous. And all this optional with the Secretary of the Interior. Why, many of the very best mines are above timber line. And these great enterprises are to be dependent upon the option of one man, and he 3,000 miles away.

I say that, instead of hedging about this great industry with rules and regulations at the option of one man, it should be left the greatest liberty—not only the right to acquire the mineral itself, but the right to acquire all those accessories so essential to the proper enjoyment of the mineral lands discovered and developed. This must of necessity lead us to the only conclusion that can give any sort of security for investment, and that is that absolute title should pass, and not a mere permission to use, which permission may be granted by one and refused by another. No sane person would think for a moment of making any investment in mining claims situate upon lands encompassed by any such rules or regulation. Again, what must be the effect upon the cattle industry in such localities? Men have invested large sums in this business on the strength of having the use of ranges upon the public domain. As I have said, nearly a million and a half of cattle are in Colorado, a great portion of which are kept upon the public domain. What must be the effect upon this business in putting these vast areas in forest reserves? I know many cattlemen here advocated the establishment of these reservations, but, I think, with little information as to the effect upon the business. Once the range is put within a reservation, no stock can be grazed thereon without a permit. No permit, I believe, is for longer than one year. No right is granted to erect inclosures, so essential to the various uses of the business.

The number of cattle must be limited; permission must be first had to go upon the reserve and to take stock across it. Now, under these and other regulations, what sane man would care to invest in the cattle business where his grazing rights are so insecure and where, at the option of the Secretary, his rights might be revoked? And then consider the violations of regulations that might destroy the privileges so granted. I have already spoken of the effect upon the lumbering industry and the insecurity that would necessarily come from the repeal of the timber and stone act.

Placing all these large areas of timber within the reserves would undoubtedly largely lessen the production of lumber, while at the same time no saving would be had of the timber supply.

Any person at all conversant with the timber growth of Colorado knows that merchantable timber is largely matured, and hence ought to be disposed of to meet the demands of that new and growing country. I do not wish to be understood as claiming that abuses may not exist that ought to be rectified; but I insist that the way to rectify the evil is not to put the matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, to be administered at his option or discretion.

Nor would I say that the Department has not striven honestly and fairly to execute the law in this regard, but I do insist that with all the various matters that come within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior it is impossible for him to give that attention to the administration of forest reserves which they demand. When we consider that the maximum number of those employed in this work is not to exceed 500 and that the territory is rather in excess of 100,000 square miles, it is apparent that some change ought to be made. Nor am I particularly impressed with the influences back of this movement to repeal our very satisfactory laws governing the acquisition of public lands. While I am aware that many well-meaning persons favor the repeal, I am also aware that a very powerful organization is in existence whose purposes can not be said to be purely philanthropic. At the hearings before the Committee on Irrigation and Arid Lands it was admitted that certain powerful railroad companies were contributing the sum of $39,000 per annum for the purpose of securing the repeal of these laws and the establishment of these forest reserves.

Mr. Maxwell, in his statement before this committee, admitted this fact. And while the use of this large sum by these powerful corporations is perhaps not sufficient to warrant a belief that their purposes are questionable, still the fact that these companies have immense tracts of timber lands is sufficient to warrant the presumption that they would be largely benefited by the repeal of these laws and the withdrawal of timber lands from entry.

I insist that the public domain should be disposed of, not so much for the benefit of the Government as for the benefit of the people who seek to better their condition by reclaiming it and by the development of its natural resources. And then those who have gone upon this domain and by their energy and industry have builded great States have the right to expect that all this vast territory shall be made to contribute to their comforts, if not to their wealth, and that in the erection of these States this land shall be made to bear its share of the burden of taxation for the common good. Colorado, blessed as she is with all that goes to make a splendid and prosperous Commonwealth, with her wealth of gold exceeding that of any other State, with an abundance of iron and coal, with agriculture exceeding in value even that of her mines, with her great herds of cattle and sheep, and with a people brave, just, courageous, and patriotic, has a right to ask that you lay no further burdens upon her industry nor destroy the possibilities of her glorious future.

In times past we have felt that the General Government has not always had in view the interests of this people, and some of our thriving settlements are become almost desolate through hostile legislation, which, even if wise, was indeed harmful to us. And more recently we have had the opportunity of witnessing the haste with which the Government has sought to benefit a foreign people at the expense of another great and growing industry. We have stood this all simply because we have been compelled to stand it, while paying tribute to all the industries of the East.

We are compelled still to witness the fervor with which our Government is reaching out and caring for other peoples of different race and with little knowledge and less regard for the institutions of our country, and in the midst of it all we are possibly to be subjected to the further wrong of having vast areas within our borders taken from us and governed by a Department whose knowledge of our conditions and necessities can at best be but partial, and under rules and regulations adopted at its will and pleasure.

We have heard much of government by injunction, but I doubt if this could be more harmful in its worst form than government by Executive order or departmental rules and regulations. Is the Government domain so valuable that the people must become trespassers when they go upon it? Then it should be surrounded and protected by positive law, and not by the option or discretion of a Secretary, however honest he may be. When all our desert land has been withdrawn for reclamation purposes and all our forests are under the control of an inspector, the ordinary man seeking a home in this great State had better "take to the woods," if the forest ranger will permit him.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, there has been considerable uncertainty in the public mind about the position of the Democratic party upon the tariff question, but the uncertainty is now gradually disappearing as the coming campaign is drawing closer to hand. In the early days of this Congress it was claimed that it was not the purpose to remove all protective duties, that the necessity of the Government revenues were such that in order to raise a sufficient amount such imposts were necessary as would afford a considerable degree of protection—incidental protection; that free trade was entirely out of the question and that Republicans who charged the opposition with being for free trade were making an unfounded and unfair charge. This was, if I understood them right, the position of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], who represents the minority on the Committee on Rules, as well as of my colleague [Mr. LIND].

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], on the other hand, seemed to favor free trade as the ultimate object to be attained, but was willing to make the approach gradually; he would make no sudden changes, would not knock the scaffolding down all at once, but gradually. He would not administer the remedy in one dose, so to speak, for fear it would suddenly kill the patient, but would accustom him to the poison gradually until he got so accustomed to it as to be able to take it clear.

This is the underlying idea of his magazine article "What Democracy stands for," as well as of his numerous deliverances on the subject on this floor.

But even this scant hope held out to the friends of protection of a slow and lingering death has been dashed to pieces by the latest utterances of the leading orators and acknowledged spokesmen of the party upon this floor, for they have now come out for complete free trade and denounced protection as robbery, pure and simple. The eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] in no part of his speech of Saturday last received so unanimous and vociferous approval from his compatriots of the minority as when he denounced protection as "plunder" and "robbery," pure and simple. Now, why this marked difference between the reception of the earlier speeches upon the subject and last one?

Have we not the right to conclude that the earlier views were regarded as too timid, too weak, and did not go far enough, but that this last speech accurately and truly voices the real sentiment of Democracy in this House upon the tariff question? Of course the gentleman from New York did not say how soon the Democracy if intrusted with power would put a stop to this "plunder and robbery" of the many for the benefit of a few manufacturers, but judging from his just wrath over the outrage and his vehement denunciation one would hardly suppose he would wait even till "over night" to completely destroy it "root and branch" and tear down the custom-houses from "turret to foundation stone," so ardently advocated some time ago by the other gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

He would no doubt destroy the system of plunder and robbery instantly. Delay to him would be not only dangerous, but criminal. Of course if the system of protection is to be destroyed, then reciprocity will also disappear, for the kind of reciprocity which has been advocated by the Democracy relates to competitive products only, and therefore as they will all come in free there is nothing left with which to reciprocate. We can not do more than let the foreign competitive products in free, and therefore we can ask no concessions in foreign markets. We could no more justify the return to robbery and plunder by protective duties for the sake of getting free access to foreign markets than we could for the sake of building up a few favored producers.

Reciprocity in competitive products is partial free trade, and it was because of this that the Democratic party, as represented in this House, claimed to be in favor of the Cuban treaty. They justified their vote on that measure because, they said, it was "a step in the right direction." In the same way and for the same reason they advocate the free interchange of natural products with Canada, which is the only "reciprocity" that Canada is willing to agree to. It is alleged that if we admit the natural products of the soil of Canada free, that it will extend our trade with that country in manufactures; that our goods would, in return for this favor, be admitted under the same preferential duties as those of Great Britain.

No one has more eloquently advocated this policy than my colleague from the Fifth district of Minnesota [Mr. LIND]. I have no doubt that he voices the sentiment of many of his constituents, the manufacturers and jobbers of the city of Minneapolis, who naturally desire to extend their trade across the border, but when he undertakes to do this in behalf of the interest of the farmers he is very much mistaken. It would seem to be almost too plain for argument that the letting into our markets free all the farm products of Canada would not be in the interest of the farmers of this country. In this behalf it may be admitted that wheat is not the important item, for the price of that commodity is to some extent fixed abroad, but the market for cheese, butter, eggs, poultry, oats, barley, hay, cattle, and other products of the farm is here, and Canadian competition would inevitably depress prices and injure our farmers.

To most advocates of reciprocity in natural products with Canada this is the main purpose. I quote, for instance, from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], who, in his speech of January 19, said:

> Canada needs a market for her lumber, fish, and farm products, coal, and ores. Our manufacturers would be benefited by her lumber, coal, and ores, as they would afford relief from the exactions of our tariff-protected trusts, and our labor would receive the benefit of lower prices for food through the competition of Canada's fish, farm, and dairy products. On the other hand, Canada requires our agricultural implements, boots, shoes, and manufactures of cotton, rubber, iron, and steel. I do not believe reciprocity with Canada is an academic proposition. The shoe manufacturers of New England evidently regard it as a practical proposition and consider the theories of its opponents as academic. The benefits resulting from his consummation will be real, not fanciful. If we open our doors to Canada's products, the necessaries of industry will become cheaper; then our manufacturers will sell cheaper and their sales will increase.

My colleague [Mr. LIND] argued in his speech at the early days of this session that the quantity of these products was so small that the effect on our markets would be very slight. But Canada produces large quantities of these commodities and is capable of producing much more. The farmers of Minnesota have no objection to free trade with Canada in farm implements and machinery, or shoes, or lumber, but they strenuously object to free trade in farm products so long as we retain a protective tariff on manufactures. In other words, they are not willing to play the part of the lamb in this proposed sacrificial ceremony.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND] first shows that the Canadian Northwest has an agricultural area greater than the whole of our country and more fertile, and capable of soon outstripping us in productions of the farm; and then he goes on to say that the quantity they could send us would be so small that it would not affect our prices! It is as illogical as his strawberry argument. He stated that strawberries were selling in Winnipeg at 25 cents per box, and in Minneapolis at three boxes for a quarter, and they could not be shipped there because of the tariff. The American tariff is and was 2 cents per quart, and the Canadian 2 cents per pound. He could have bought a box for 8⅓ cents, paid 3 cents duty and express charges, and still have doubled his money.

In this instance it is the Canadian tariff that is high and not ours, and we are not to blame for that; and yet we find him pathetically crying out, "I believe it to be wicked in the sight of God to thus prevent the good people of Canada from enjoying the luscious products that we produce to the southward." This wickedness in the sight of God consists in our placing a duty of one-third less than the Canadians do on the same article, and thus preventing the export of it at a greater profit than 100 per cent. Horrible, is it not? The whole speech is a plea for free trade with Canada in natural products, because it will give us access to the Canadian markets for our manufacturers. In other words, the gentleman wants to trade off the farmer for the benefit of the manufacturer.

The American farmer is to pay protective prices for his machinery, and the Canadians are to have our markets free. But he says the Canadians are so few, only about 5,000,000 people, and we are 80,000,000. In other words, we are sixteen to one; and as that is the gentleman's favorite ratio in the matter of silver and gold coinage, it is but natural that he should want to maintain it. We are to trade off sixteen customers of the farmers in order that the agricultural implement and other manufacturers in our country may gain one. That is, as the gentleman says, to "Approach these great fiscal and economic questions in a spirit as broad and comprehensive as that of the elder statesmen and befitting the future and the potentialities of this nation." But the Republicans of Minnesota will not be deceived by such high-sounding phrases as these.

The Republican party of Minnesota, where the farmer influence is dominant, in its recent State convention spoke with no uncertain language on this question of reciprocity. The whole resolution on the subject of tariff and reciprocity is as follows:

> We iterate our faith in the historic principle of protection. Under its influence our country, foremost in the bounties of nature, has become foremost in production. It has enabled the laborer to successfully insist upon good wages and has induced capital to engage in production with a reasonable hope of a fair reward. Its vindication is found in the history of its success and the rapidity with which our national resources have been developed and our industrial independence secured, and we heartily renew our pledge to maintain it.
> We believe protection and reciprocity are twin measures of Republican policy and success, or, in other words, the correct application of reciprocity is protection. We demand enlarged markets for the products of our farms and factories. We demand admission of the necessaries of life which we do not produce from other countries under reciprocal agreements of mutual interests, which gain open markets for us with other nations, always keeping in view the fact that our home protection must not be impaired. We favor such modifications of tariff schedules as from time to time are required by changing conditions and insist that such changes shall be made in line with the fundamental principle of protection.

This resolution was adopted after the newspapers of St. Paul and Minneapolis had for the last two years carried on an aggressive propaganda in favor of Canadian reciprocity. I notice that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in his recent speech in this House took occasion, in a very good-natured and humorous way, to criticise the part of the above resolution relating to the tariff as inconsistent and an attempt to ride two horses going in opposite directions at the same time; and as it is expressed in such happy terms, I quote it, as follows:

On the 18th of this month the Republicans of Minnesota, in convention assembled, nominated a ticket and made a declaration of principles. In their platform they say—

"We favor such modifications of tariff schedules as from time to time are required by changing conditions, and insist that such changes shall be made in line with the fundamental principles of protection."

All Representatives are, of course, familiar with the Bible, and have read the twenty-seventh chapter of Genesis, in which is recorded that weird story describing the ingenious plan which Rebekah devised to enable her favorite son Jacob to secure from his father Isaac the blessing which was intended for his favorite son Esau. Isaac was old and his eyes were dim, so that he could not see, but his sense of feeling was still acute; and when Jacob presented himself to receive the blessing which did not belong to him, but to his hairy brother, Isaac, being somewhat suspicious, said unto Jacob:

"Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau or not."

And Jacob went near unto Isaac, his father, and he felt him and said: "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

And he discerned him not, because his hands were hairy, as his brother Esau's hands; so he blessed him.

And he said, "Art thou my very son Esau?" And he said, "I am."

Governor Cummings and Brother Dalzell, representing the extreme factions in the Republican party, will have to exercise all their senses of seeing, smelling, tasting, hearing, and touch, to judge whether the Minnesota statesmen are Jacobs or Esaus, and will even then find themselves in gravest doubt.

But, pray, where is the inconsistency in the above declaration? Changes in schedules as required by changing conditions can certainly harmonize with revision in line with the "fundamental principle of protection." The fundamental principle of protection here referred to is that the measure of the impost shall only be sufficient to equalize the difference in the rate of wages of labor here and abroad. When a duty exceeds that amount it may be reduced to that figure and still be protective. That changed conditions may result in so cheapening production as to make the duty on an article higher than the above fundamental principle of protection requires is self-evident. When such a case arises we demand such a reduction. A duty in excess of what this principle requires has no justification.

The accurate adjustment of duties in harmony with the above rule is a delicate and difficult matter; but the Republican party can and will do this work efficiently and well by following the above principle, whereas, for the Democratic party, being controlled, imbued, and permeated by free trade and tariff for revenue ideas, to attempt to do so would be as disastrous now as it was in 1893. The Republicans of Minnesota meant to and did declare in favor of tariff revision and of a revision upon above lines.

We expect that the national convention at Chicago will also declare in favor of this kind of revision, and that in the next session of this Congress this work will actually begin. We "stand pat" on the principle of protection, but not on tariff schedules or rates of duty. We favor revision, but it must be revision in harmony with the fundamental principles and policies of the Republican party. We favor reciprocity, but it must be reciprocity that will extend our trade abroad without injuring our own people.

I can not understand the wisdom of the policy that advocates the building up and developing of another country in preference to our own. Let us rather, in the eloquent language of a Democratic orator, "declare that we will legislate for our own people upon every question, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation on earth." Take the great State of Minnesota, for example; we have a great State, with as moral, patriotic, intelligent, and prosperous people as can be found on the face of the earth. We have as fine, if not the finest, system of public schools extant; we have great charitable and philanthropic institutions richly endowed, and a system of laws and jurisprudence as perfect and benevolent as any State in the Union.

We have thousands of miles of the best equipped railways, carrying our freight and passenger traffic at reasonable rates, fixed by our State authorities, where monopolies are curbed, and even the latent power to oppress by the merger of competing lines of railway is not tolerated. We have only reached the threshold of our development.

Only the other day Congress passed an act which will add, by the opening to settlement a part of what is known as the Red Lake Reservation, a quarter of a million of the finest and richest agricultural land in the Northwest. I will insert in the RECORD an article descriptive of this land, written by W. C. Smiley, esq., of Thief River Falls, Minn., and recently published in the "Review" of that place.

We have in the State of Minnesota, in addition to the above land, vacant and unoccupied Government land subject to homestead entry, 5,168,585 acres. Most of this is in the northern part of the State and is mostly timbered lands, other than pine lands. About one-half is subject to free homesteads and the balance is ceded Chippewa land subject to homestead entry on the payment of $1.25 per acre. There is also included in the above area 175,000 acres of pine land, the timber on which was sold last December, and the land will be offered for homestead entry after the pine is removed. We invite the attention of the crowded cities of the East and of the whole world to these unrivaled opportunities.

Why should we not first of all strive for the upbuilding of our own country? Is not our duty here? If we do, not only the agricultural but all interests will prosper. If the mills of Minneapolis demand more hard wheat, northern Minnesata can furnish it. Our northern Minnesota lands above referred to being covered with hard-wood timber and brush, may require a little more labor to put under cultivation than the prairie of northwestern Canada, but our soil is fully as rich and "not quite so near the north pole," and not so liable to early frosts.

Railroad construction is now being pushed into every part of northern Minnesota, bringing the markets to the very doors of the settlers. There is room for at least 30,000 families, giving each a quarter section of land, making a population of from 150,000 to 2,000,000 souls. Let us direct our energies toward building up this empire of our own, and the reward of a golden harvest of genuine and lasting prosperity is sure to come. [Applause.]

THE "ELEVEN TOWNS" SOON TO BE SOLD BY UNCLE SAM.

[By W. C. Smiley, county surveyor, Red Lake County.]

That part of the diminished Red Lake Indian Reservation soon to be opened is all of it that lies west of the range line between ranges 38 and 39, and comprises a little more than a quarter of a million acres, to be exact, 256,152 acres, equal in area to about eleven townships, and is frequently called the "Eleven Towns," although as a matter of fact the land lies in nineteen townships, some of which are, however, only small fractions. It is also sometimes spoken of as "that part of the reservation within Red Lake County," for the major portion of the land is so situated. However, a strip one mile and one-half wide and twenty-six long on the north boundary is in Marshall County, and a small fraction in the southeast corner in Polk County.

The land is, in general, level prairie, with frequent groves of poplar and brush, giving fuel for man and shelter for stock. A belt of poplar, ash, oak, and elm, from one-half to three-quarters of a mile wide, is usually found along the river, and here the land is more rolling. Thief River forms the west boundary and Clearwater River the south boundary of the tract, while Red Lake River, which is navigated by several steamboats, flows through the center of it from east to west. No point on the reservation is more than 10 miles and very little of it over 4 miles from a river.

The soil in general is a rich deep loam, with a good clay subsoil characteristic of the Red River Valley, of which it is a part. Over one-half of the land lies ready for the breaking plow. Of the balance a portion must be cleared of brush and poplar, which in this country is not a very difficult matter, and the rest requires drainage.

Of course the land is absolutely wild, and some of it is too wet for immediate cultivation. If this were not the case in so flat a country, something would be wrong with the subsoil. However, the rivers have good high banks, except as hereafter noted, and the surface has a good general slope, so that drainage is an easy matter. There is much difference between easily drained wet spots of good quality and sour peaty land which will be difficult to make fit for agriculture. Both kinds of wet land are found on the reservation. Near the east end of this tract the banks of the Clearwater and Red Lake rivers are rather low and sometimes overflow during high water. This also must be taken into account in selecting land.

RED LAKE COUNTY.

The reservation forms one-third of Red Lake County. It is, taken altogether, a rather better tract of land than the settled portion. Nothing in the county can be bought for less than $10 per acre and some of it sells for $60. These are, however, extreme cases. The average price of land now runs from $16 to $35 per acre. The population of the county is 15,000. It has two cities, Thief River Falls of 3,000 and Red Lake Falls of 2,500 population, and the village of St. Hilaire, with 1,200 population. There are 3 sawmills, 3 flour mills, 14 elevators, 6 creameries, 6 cheese factories, and 2 skimming stations located in the county. It is exclusively an agricultural and stock-raising section. All of the timber for the sawmills comes down Red Lake River from the pineries, some 60 miles distant, except a few million shipped into Thief River Falls every winter by rail.

In the county are 78 schoolhouses, exclusive of city schools, and 17 postoffices. Churches are found in every township. The Great Northern Railroad reaches the three principal points in the county, and, in addition, Red Lake Falls is on the Northern Pacific Railway. The Winnipeg branch of the Soo line, now under construction, will reach Thief River Falls in 1904.

HISTORY OF THE OPENING.

The opening of the reservation has had a varied history. Three years ago the Indians ceded the lands to the Government for $1,000,000, but Congress refused to ratify the agreement, because it bound the United States for the money and left the purchaser a chance to escape payment. Later, Congress passed a law opening the lands, but the Indians refused to agree, owing to some minor details of the plan which seemed objectionable.

About this time, fall of 1903, the Land Office threw open for settlement a large number of isolated tracts on the old Red Lake Reservation—not the diminished Red Lake Reservation—which had been held out at the time of the opening eight years ago. These lands were north and east of Red Lake County, far from market and not particularly desirable, but many believed them to be the "Eleven Towns," and there was a great rush of people, who went home disgusted and disappointed.

MANNER OF SALE.

Finally the "Act of Congress approved February 20, 1904," which is the law under which the land will be opened, was passed.

Leaving out all matter referring to payment of the Indians, this law provides:

FIRST SALE.

That the Secretary of the Interior is empowered to sell this land, subject to such rules and regulations as he may order, at not less than $4 per acre, one-fifth down and the remainder in five equal annual installments without interest. That if any payment is not made within two months after it becomes due the purchaser shall forfeit all previous payments, and the land shall again be offered for sale. That no person shall be allowed to purchase more than 160 acres, and that the purchaser must be such a person as is entitled to file on a homestead under the laws of the United States, but it is especially provided that any person who has already used his homestead right is not thereby barred from becoming a purchaser.

It is further provided that the purchaser must comply with the homestead laws as to settlement and improvements of the land for five years in order to secure the privilege of paying for it in installments, but the purchaser may prove up at the end of fourteen months, if he so desire, by paying down the full amount due on the land and the usual land office fees, amounting to about $15. The law also provides that where the reservation line cuts diagonally across a tract, if the owner of the part outside the reservation buys the adjoining fraction inside the line, his improvements and settlement on the portion outside shall count as settlement on the land purchased. These are all the provisions made for the first sale of the land. Any tracts of land not disposed of at this sale may be sold at any time thereafter, at the local land office, for $4 per acre, the purchaser being subject to the same rules as if he bought the land at the sale.

SECOND SALE.

At the end of five years all lands not disposed of at first sale shall be sold at not less than $4 per acre, with no restrictions except the payment of the cash, and lands remaining unsold after this second sale may be bought at any time thereafter by paying $4 per acre cash and with no other restriction whatever.

TIME OF SALE.

The above is all that is provided by law with regard to the sale. The time, place, and manner of sale are left entirely with the Secretary of the Interior, who will issue his instructions later. It is believed that the sale will take place at Thief River Falls, but possibly it may be at the local land office at Crookston.

At present it is thought that the time of sale will be about July, 1904. The Department can hardly complete the arrangement of details before that time, and should the sale be delayed later than September it might, for various reasons, better be postponed until next summer. Both public auction and sealed bids have been suggested as the proper method for disposing of the land. The public auction will probably be adopted, only one town being put up in one day, to avoid crowds.

THE HOMESTEAD LAW.

The free-homestead law, which, with the exceptions noted, is to govern the sale of this land, provides, briefly, that in order to secure a claim one must be a citizen of the United States, over the age of 21 years or the head of a family, and must not be the owner of over 160 acres of land at the time of filing. A married man or widow under 21 years may take a claim. An alien must before filing declare intention to become a citizen and must be fully naturalized before proving up, except that an alien who commutes, or proves up in fourteen months, as hereafter explained, may do so on his declaration of intention.

In the case of free homesteads, if the settler does not desire to wait five years before securing a title to the land, he may commute or prove up in fourteen months by the payment of $1.25 per acre or $200 on a quarter section, providing all other requirements of the law are observed. The law governing the sale of this reservation also allows the purchaser to prove up in fourteen months by paying down the full price bid for the land. It is thought that $1.25 per acre will not be required in addition to the purchase price.

The law requires that the settler, unless he commutes, must make the land his home for five years. He must not be absent at any one time from the land for a period of more than six months. He is allowed six months less one day from the time of filing to make actual settlement on the land. This six months is called constructive residence, and if followed by a proper period of actual residence it counts the same.

If, however, actual settlement is not made within the time designated, the five years is counted from the time of such actual settlement and not from time of filing.

Improvements on the land must be such as will clearly show the intention of the settler to make it his home. There is no hard and fast rule as to the amount and kind of improvements required. A house is, of course, necessary, but the other improvements required vary according to circumstances. On land that is only fit for stock raising the cutting of hay has been held to constitute good and sufficient evidence of the settler's intention to occupy and improve the land as his home.

WAYS AND MEANS.

It is just as well to say right here that the coming sale will be no place for a poor man. By this is meant that persons intending to bid should have the amount of first payment in hand and, in addition, not less than $100. Five hundred dollars is little enough. The cost of examining land, hiring locators, and of living expenses during the sale will be at least $100, and any one going on a piece of wild land, expecting to make expenses out of it from the start, is usually very badly disappointed. The buyer of modest means must plan as carefully for the coming years as if he were investing in land in any other part of the country. The coming sale will be an opportunity to secure a good piece of land at a cheap price, but hard and faithful work will be necessary to make it a self-supporting farm.

POINTERS.

There is hardly enough sandy or gravely bottom on the reservation to be worth mentioning, but that will not help you if it should happen to be under the land you buy. Look out for it, there is some of it there. Still, in some places, a thin layer of gravel lies between the loam and the clay. Such land is all right. The bad stuff is found usually on slight ridges.

There are no "alkali spots" on this land. This is mentioned because occasionally you will see places which look wonderfully like it. These are common throughout the county and do not bother when broken up. It is thought that they are all caused by the ashes from prairie fires collecting in low spots on the surface.

All over the reservation may be seen "hard heads." These are usually "prairie rocks," and do not indicate a stony soil. They are all on the surface, having been raised by frost. There are only about enough of them, in most places, for building purposes.

Much timber has been stolen—along the rivers—for fuel. See that you do not get a piece of stump land.

WATER.

Plenty of good water is found in the country about the reservation, except around Germantown, at a depth of 20 to 30 feet. It is supposed that the same conditions exist on the land to be sold.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, what further remarks I desire to make on the measure I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the question?

Mr. HAMILTON. To extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, stop. Are those remarks upon the bill, or are they a general political speech?

Mr. HAMILTON. We have not been limited on either side in this respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will object to any general leave to print or any leave to extend where gentlemen have not actually made remarks upon the floor or where they do not intend to confine themselves to the question under debate. In other words, I have no idea that the RECORD should be filled with campaign material in the last three days and——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman not think it is better to fill the RECORD with the speeches than the House?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think it is better to have remarks of that sort stated where they can be heard.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better to have them stated where they can not be heard?

Mr. KLUTTZ. Three leaves ought to be granted to print on this side before you interpose an objection, as three have been granted on that side.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman from Missouri kindly proceed? Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, was unanimous consent given?

The CHAIRMAN. It was. The gentleman from Missouri will desist until the gentlemen in the aisles take their seats.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry. Was the consent given before I rose?

Mr. HAMILTON. It was.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent was given before the gentleman from Mississippi rose.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] and the gentleman from Georgia, my colleague [Mr. BARTLETT], in the course of some remarks submitted to this House on the race question, took occasion to put in the RECORD two letters which had been written by ex-President Cleveland respecting a constituent of mine, Mr. Watson. Mr. Watson requests that this letter which I have in my hand, and which is a reply to those letters, be read from the Clerk's desk, and I now ask that the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THOMSON, GA., April 13, 1904.

Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: From the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle of this morning I learn that the Hon. CHARLES BARTLETT has caused to be read from the Clerk's desk the letter of Mr. Cleveland, dated March 14, 1904, in which Mr. Cleveland makes denial of statements made by me several weeks ago.

Mr. BARTLETT wishes Mr. Cleveland's letter to circulate by means of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In the name of fair play, as a matter of mere justice, I beg that you will have this letter of mine read in the same manner, in order that it shall be known upon what grounds I based the statements which Mr. Cleveland so insultingly denies.

First. I claimed that he favored mixed schools in New York. He says that he opposed them, and that the measure was defeated.

His signature will be found to the act of May 5, 1884, which changed colored schools into mixed schools. (See page 307 chapter 248, New York Laws.) He approved and signed the act. He did not veto it; although he was fond of vetoes.

Second. I stated that Fred Douglass and wife were guests at the wedding reception of Mr. Cleveland.

Anyone who will read the Washington Post of June 16, 1886, will see an elaborate account of that brilliant occasion, and they will see the names of Fred Douglass and wife in the list of guests.

This was the first reception Mr. Cleveland held after his wedding. The regular official "season" was over. It was not a state function, nor were the guests officials only. It was crowded with social leaders, distinguished foreigners, eminent civilians out of office, as well as by Supreme Court judges, Senators, naval officers, and generals of the Army. Coming first after the wedding and being so exceptionally brilliant, it came to be known as the "wedding reception."

When I said that he appointed a negro to be minister to one of the white republics of South America, I knew the proof would sustain that statement also. C. H. J. Taylor was the negro, and Bolivia was the country.

Very respectfully, yours,

THOS. E. WATSON.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to prolong any dispute between Mr. Thomas Watson, the former Populist candidate for Vice-President, and Mr. Cleveland, former Democratic President. It is proper to state, however, that the paper from which Mr. Watson quotes, the Washington Post of the 16th of April, 1886, shows that the reception to which he refers was a public reception, and if he had been entirely fair he would have so stated. Now, Mr. Watson is not a Democrat, and I desire to put in the RECORD a letter from him which demonstrates this assertion, so that the people of my State may fully understand what his political status is, and that he stands ready to oppose the Democratic party and its nominees at the approaching election.

I ask unanimous consent to print this letter as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks leave to insert a certain letter in his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Do I understand that this is a request for unanimous consent to insert that article?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I merely wish to inquire if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was present?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Mississippi would have objected to it if his objections to the gentleman's request had been listened to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to inflict this upon the House by having it read now, but if objection is made to my request I will have it read in my time. I simply desire to put it in the RECORD. It is a letter taken from the Missouri World, and has been published in the Georgia papers.

Mr. MANN. Nobody objects to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TOM WATSON GIVES HIS VIEWS ON THE PRESENT POLITICAL SITUATION TO AN OLD FRIEND, IN WHICH CAMPAIGN AGAINST OLD PARTIES IS ENCOURAGED.

MY DEAR SIR: Yours received. The fusion policy has not been more disastrous than I anticipated. It destroyed the grandest reform movement this country has known since the civil war.

Had Mr. Bryan adopted your plan in 1896 he would have been President, and some legislation beneficial to the masses might have been enacted. At present we have the sorry spectacle of two great political parties with no issue whatever separating them.

Both are for tariffs, both are for national banks, both are for huge appropriations, both are committed to militarism.

Neither dares to attack the trusts, neither dares to declare against class legislation, neither dares to offend the money power.

The only thing the Republicans and Democrats really fight over is the spoils of office.

In all other things they are as alike as two peas.

They preserve their separate organizations for the sole purpose of deluding the people and preventing the organization of an actual party of opposition.

Even on the negro question there is no real difference.

Roosevelt dined Booker T. Washington and Cleveland had Fred Douglas as an invited guest at his marriage reception.

Cleveland put as many negroes in office as Roosevelt has done.

And if there was ever a rottener Administration than the second term of Cleveland it would puzzle the historian to name it.

There never was a time more favorable for a straight, fearless fight on both the old parties. By all means make the effort.

Personally, I can stand loyally to the faith and wield my pen. I have made too many enemies. My name would be a burden to any new movement.

Choose some younger man, who has made no enemies, and make an aggressive contest, and in my judgment the old parties will have cause to tremble for the results.

Yours, truly, THOS. E. WATSON.

FEBRUARY 29, 1904.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order and submit it to the Chair without remarks. The point of order is that the Committee of the Whole has no right to give leave to print or leave to extend.

Mr. TAWNEY. Except in individual cases.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it has in individual cases the right to give leave to extend, but not the right to give a general leave to extend. It has always been so held.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The point of order I wish to make is that the Committee of the Whole has no right to give general leave to print or extend. It has the right to give leave to extend to a gentleman upon the subject-matter under consideration. The point of order I make is that under the leaves to extend no extension can be made except extension of remarks pertinent to the matter under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole have given the right to gentlemen speaking in debate to extend their remarks without limitation.

Mr. LUCKING. Mr. Chairman, representing in this House the city of Detroit, with its 325,000 people, located on the Canadian border, I desire to give voice to their almost unanimous demand for freer trade relations with the people of Canada. Our interests have been sacrificed for the last thirty-five years by the General Government through a policy which we firmly believe to be a mistake for the whole country.

The citizens of Detroit are convinced that the general welfare of all our people will be promoted by liberal trade on both sides, even though some slight or temporary inconvenience or injury might arise to some insignificant interest, and that therefore her demand is reasonable and should be voiced and heeded. The opposition to a general measure of advancement because of some disadvantage to an individual business is as unreasonable as that of the hand artisan to the introduction of machinery, or of the country grocer to the rural free delivery, or the small village to interurban electric lines. The smaller must give way to the general good for the time being, and in the long run all will share in the prosperity.

I assume in what I shall say that reciprocity with Canada will involve a freer market in Canada for our manufactured products as well as for our agricultural products. In exchange for reduced tariffs on her products, especially her lumber, logs, minerals, wheat, and fish, Canada will give our manufacturers much freer access to her rapidly growing population. Except on these terms I would not deem it worth while to attempt a negotiation. Some of her public men have been quoted against this, but they were speaking publicly, and we could not expect them in advance to "give away their case" or to state their best terms. Besides, they were speaking as individuals and not in any sense as authorized representatives of their government.

Detroit is vitally interested in this problem. She is so located on the border that nearly one-half of her natural tributary territory is cut off by this artificial wall. Across the river are the small cities, villages, and smiling productive fields, and the highly cultured population of Ontario. We are connected with all parts of the Dominion by four great systems of railway, which spread like a network over her entire expanse and reach every village and hamlet, while our steamboat lines ramify in all directions along her shores but scarcely ever touch because of this absurd barrier to trade.

Hundreds of thousands of Canadians visit us every year, but are forbidden to buy in our shops, as they would be glad to do, by the brass-buttoned customs officers who stand guard at every ferry on both sides of the lakes and rivers. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians have left their homes and settled on our side of the line from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and a large fraction of our population in all our thriving lake cities and States is made up of them and their children. They can not send even a Christmas gift home to mother, sister, or cousin, or receive one, without the most annoying and vexatious interference and delay. We have over 30,000 Canadian-born residents in Detroit, and with their children they make up about 60,000—nearly one-fifth of our population. In Chicago there are 35,000 Canadian-born; in Buffalo, 18,000; in Cleveland, 10,000, and in Boston, 50,000. We have free trade in sons and daughters. Let us have freer commercial relations all along the line.

The United States has 80,000,000 people, Canada has 6,000,000, both growing rapidly. Her territory equals or exceeds ours. Her habitable lands, capable of cultivation, will support 100,000,000 people. She has inexhaustible supplies of raw materials for manufacture. Her known resources are vast and alluring, and only suffice to give evidence of still greater stores beyond.

Our manufacturing interests are now developed beyond the needs of our own consumers in nearly all lines and we are seeking outside markets.

There is no field in the world so advantageous and promising, from any and all points of view, as Canada. Her vast empire stretches along our northern border from ocean to ocean, and is rapidly filling with a people homogeneous to our own, not simply an Anglo-Saxon population, but an American population, composed of the best of the white European races, living as we live, advancing as we advance along all lines of human achievement. Their standard of living and of civilization is like our own, and that makes them the greatest consumers, man for man, in the world, so that her six millions are equal as consumers to twelve millions of some other peoples and to eighteen or twenty-four millions of still others.

In spite of our contemptuous treatment of Canada commercially, she is the third largest customer for our goods in the world, Great Britain being the first and Germany the second, and Canada buys more of our manufactures than any other one country. We exported to Canada in 1903 $125,776,000, and we imported $55,649,000.

Our stand-pat friends, who oppose reciprocity, boast of this trade as if it were a result of their policy instead of its being in spite of it, as everybody knows. The natural results of their policy would be to stop all traffic, but because a goodly trade exists notwithstanding all obstructions they boast of it as if they were responsible for it.

They brag of our total foreign trade as if it were marvelous, but the figures of Canada's foreign trade show that ours is only small in proportion. Our total foreign trade in 1903 was two thousand four hundred and forty-five millions, while Canada's was four hundred and seventy-eight millions. Thus our trade was only $30.50 per capita, while hers was $79.66. While her population is less than one-thirteenth of ours, her trade was one-fifth as great; in other words, her foreign commerce without a Dingley tariff wall is more than two and one-half times as great in proportion to population.

More food for reflection for our stand-pat friends is that while our foreign trade increased 50 per cent from 1896 to 1903, viz, from sixteen hundred millions in 1896 to twenty-four hundred millions in 1903, Canada's increased 100 per cent—from two hundred and thirty-nine millions in 1896 to four hundred and seventy-eight millions in 1903. Again, when we are boasting of the good times of 1903 as against the hard times of 1896, as if it were due to an increase of tariff, it is well to remember that Canada, without any such tariff changes and with an average tariff of only about one-third of ours, went through the same experience—from hard times in 1896 to good times in 1903.

Our farmers are hurrying in troops into the Dominion and settling on the limitless wheat fields of the new Northwest. They want to buy their supplies from home—the thousand and one articles of domestic comfort and necessity. For illustration, they want to buy their stoves from Detroit, the greatest stove-manufacturing center in the world. Why should they be forbidden? What inexpressible folly on our part to limit and curtail our own markets!

Detroit sends nearly one-fifth of all the exports of the United States to Canada, and it is the belief of our manufacturers and merchants that we could easily double and quadruple our trade with that great and growing country if it were not for the Chinese wall, invisible but substantial, which is built by the statutes of the United States.

While we constitute but one two hundred and fortieth part of the population of the United States, we are favorably situated for knowing the effect of this tariff wall upon our industries, and we desire the Representatives of the United States to know that we are substantially unanimous in favor of a decided change in our policy toward trade with the Dominion. Detroit is essentially a manufacturing and jobbing town. We have upward of 3,000 factories engaged in diversified forms of industry and employing upward of 75,000 operatives.

Our people have no selfish desire to increase and expand at the expense or to the injury of the remainder of the country, but, believing firmly that freer exchanges with Canada would be mutually beneficial to all the people of both countries, we desire to do everything in our power to bring it about, and we earnestly submit that a measure which promises on one side development of forest, field, and mine, and on the other new markets for manufactures, and on both sides profits to millions of people, ought not to be stayed because some trifling industry cries out in needless fear.

On January 19, 1904, the Detroit Board of Commerce, composed of nearly a thousand of our leading manufacturers, merchants, bankers, jobbers, and business men, unanimously adopted strong resolutions in favor of Canadian reciprocity. I personally, about a year ago, addressed a note of inquiry at random to a number of leading manufacturers, perhaps two-thirds of whom were Republicans and one-third Democrats, and received seventy-five replies. Of these, all but four expressed themselves enthusiastically in favor of reciprocity. Two of the four had already established branch factories in Canada, and for that reason alone opposed the measure, and one of the other two afterwards expressed his perfect willingness to abide by the wish of the great body of Detroit manufacturers.

Within the last few days I have received a letter from the Michigan Manufacturers' Association, the opening sentence of which is as follows:

> A vote taken by the Michigan Manufacturers' Association shows us substantially unanimous in favor of Canadian reciprocity; that is to say, the association is desirous of proper investigation of the question by the International Joint High Commission.

This association is composed of manufacturers located in forty cities throughout the State of Michigan. I think I may safely say, without fear of contradiction, that at least 99 per cent of our Detroit citizens are in favor of much freer trade relations with Canada.

A favorite saying of the opponents of reciprocity is, "We can not afford to throw open the markets of 80,000,000 people in exchange for the markets of 6,000,000." This appears plausible, but it is not sound. As well might the big city say the same thing to the small village near by, or New York to Albany, or Philadelphia or Detroit to its surrounding small towns. The villager no sooner sells to the city a dollar's worth than he is able to buy a dollar's worth, and so the ability of the 6,000,000 to sell and to influence our markets is limited by their numbers and is fully equaled by their purchasing power.

If the Canadians were great producers and nonconsumers, there would be force in the argument; but they are, like ourselves, free and generous livers, according to their capacity.

Our manufacturers see before them, across the border, a great and inviting field, from which they are largely barred by their own laws and the obstinacy of their own Government. For years to come Canada will be devoted largely to the development of her natural resources and to the production of raw materials. The American manufacturer is crying aloud for wider markets, and why not gratify the cry? Why go thousands of miles away from home, chasing oriental will-o'-the-wisps? If our practical Detroit manufacturers all unite in saying they would be largely benefited, that their sales would be increased, and that no harm would come to them, it is a pretty good test and good evidence for the rest of the country to accept. Foreign outlets are now essential to the permanent prosperity of our factories, and unless we strike for freer markets in Canada it is certain that even the present outlet into that great country will not continue as free as at present.

Our friends on the other side of this Chamber profess to desire an extension of our foreign trade. What field is so inviting or so promising in all the world? It is directly at our own doors, touching us along a great expanse. Why should we go warring around the world searching for trade with nontrading peoples when trade on profitable terms is at our own doors, knocking to enter. Our entire trade with the Philippines last year was $17,000,000, bringing a profit of perhaps four millions, at a cost in increased war and naval expenditures of perhaps one hundred millions, while our trade with Canada was one hundred and eighty millions, without a dollar of expense.

What statesmanship it is that goes hunting for trade with war ships and soldiers in remote corners of the world at incalculable loss in blood and treasure and at the same time slams the door in the face of gentle Miss Canada, who comes with arms filled with the golden sheaves of commerce and her face all aglow with peace, amity, and sisterly affection?

It is one thing to protect our industries against the pauper labor of Europe and the highly organized and capitalized manufactories of Europe, and an absolutely different thing to set up these same barriers against Canada. One may be wise and the other the height of folly.

Surely in manufacturing we can hold our own, but many opponents of reciprocity claim that it would be injurious to our farmers, an idea which seems to me to be without any just foundation.

If our factories are able to sell more goods in Canada, it follows that more men will be employed in those factories and our farmers will have just so many more mouths to feed—surely an offset to any importations likely to be made from Canada.

The effect upon farm prices in the United States would be trifling and, in fact, almost infinitesimal.

A careful comparison of the relative volume of American production and Canadian export in all principal lines of farm products shows that the volume of their exports is so small, compared to the total domestic production of the United States, that even if all Canada's exports were dumped into the United States they would not appreciably affect the American market. This is true in wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, hay, horses, cattle, sheep, eggs, flour, cheese, etc. What I mean may be illustrated by the statement that the total export of eggs from Canada to all countries in the world in 1903 was only about 1 per cent of the production of the United States, and less than two eggs in a whole year for each inhabitant of the United States.

The principal farm production to be imported would no doubt be wheat; but as the price of this, both in Canada and in the United States, is fixed by the price at Liverpool, it is absurd to suppose that even if all of Canada's production went by way of the United States, either as wheat or as flour, it would appreciably affect the American market. In 1903 the import of farm products into the United States from Canada was $9,200,000, while the export of the same to Canada was $21,601,000. This showing renders it probable that under reciprocal free exchange the Canadians would import fully as great a quantity of farm products as would we, while at the same time it would be an incalculable advantage to hundreds of thousands of farmers throughout the entire North, east of the Rocky Mountains, if Canadian lumber and timber and logs were admitted free into the United States, because the vast forests of Michigan and Wisconsin are now practically denuded, while millions of acres of the finest timber lands in the world remain untouched across the border, from which supplies at reasonable prices may be drawn for our people for many years to come.

It is fatuous for us to suppose the Canadians will continue the present arrangements very much longer. They admitted in 1903 about $70,000,000 worth of our goods absolutely free, and upon fifty-five millions more they levied an average duty of about 25 per cent, whereas we have raised a 50 per cent tariff wall against nearly all their productions. The result is that they took of us $125,000,000, while we only took of them $55,000,000. One of their great political parties is wholly committed to the doctrine of retaliation against us, while the other, which is the party in power, declares its purpose to wait a little longer, and if we still persist in our present course it will then fall into line with the doctrine of retaliation.

The time is now ripe for the display of a liberal policy upon our part, and if we have the wisdom we can effect arrangements which will redound to our untold advantage for all time to come. A member of the Canadian government in November, 1903, declared:

> It will be a serious mistake to suppose that this state of matters will be allowed to continue. Either the tariff wall of the United States will be very materially lowered from the present scale of 50 per cent upon dutiable imports or the Canadian wall will be made much higher.

It is now a question of amity and reciprocity or of irritation and open commercial hostilities, a most deplorable thing from all points of view. Michigan had one severe lesson when Canada in retaliation for the Dingley high tariff on lumber prohibited the exportation of logs, the result of which was the shutting down of about thirty large sawmills on the Michigan Lake Huron shore, throwing out of employment thousands of men and the utter desolation of a number of thriving towns. This shows how narrow selfishness will often blind people to their own permanent good.

The manufacturers of Detroit appreciate that the markets of Canada are capable of indefinite and illimitable expansion, and that while the present market is of some importance it is of infinitely greater prospective value, provided our Government is wise and seizes its opportunities. The present policy of this Government tends to drive American capital into investment in Canadian raw materials and in Canadian manufactures. This is true even with the tariff walls of Canada very low, and if they are increased, as is now threatened, the result will be that in a very few years our markets in Canada will be destroyed, and we will not only lose what we have got but will lose a chance of the great increase which it is plain to any man of good, common sense can be readily obtained by reasonable concessions and without injury to ourselves.

Nothing has contributed so much to the marvelous advancement of our country as perfect freedom of intercourse and exchange between the States and the great facilities for it. If this is so, the extension of it between ourselves and Canada, the throwing down of all barriers and the building up of facilities of transportation and intercommunication, will build up, strengthen, and expand both lands.

The people of Detroit want to trade with the Canadians, and I will tell you why:

First, because they have got the stuff we want, exactly—lumber, timber, logs, minerals, raw materials; and we have got just what they want—the manufactured products—a thousand articles turned out by our busy factories.

Second, because they are the same kind of people as ourselves—the best in the world.

Third, because they are our next-door neighbors, our friends, our cousins, our brothers—blood of our blood and flesh of our flesh.

Fourth, because the line between us is largely imaginary. But for these artificial barriers we would, "like kindred drops, have melted into one."

Fifth, because the future is big with promise for the trade of both lands, if sane counsels prevail.

Sixth, because peace, commerce, and honest friendship are far more to be preferred than commercial war.

William McKinley, on the day before his assassination, standing on the borders of Canada, speaking of trade, proclaimed: "The period of exclusiveness is past;" and I can imagine him turning his face toward the beautiful and fertile and friendly shores of Canada as he gave utterance to that grand thought. For many years he had stood as the representative of certain favored interests in this land, but he was now lifted above all such considerations to the plane of pure and lofty statesmanship. Without further personal ambitions, intent only upon making a signal success of his last Administration, he admitted and declared that a change was necessary and pointed forward in the direction that he intended to lead his people.

How sorrowful and how unfortunate that he should have been cut down just as he reached the vantage ground of a second and last administration and his vision cleared. But where do we find his followers and successors? More firmly fixed and set than ever in the policy of exclusiveness. The stand-patters and the Chinamen are first cousins—they both would build a wall against outside intercourse. If their policy is a correct one, you ought to erect an absolutely impassable commercial barrier and allow no trade whatever. You should shut out Canada's products and Canada would shut out ours. But no, you say; you want reciprocity in noncompetitive articles.

This policy absolutely bars traffic with any nation in the world whose trade is worth having. You want to trade with a lot of savages and half-civilized tribes who have no trade worth while. If your doctrines are correct, it would be wise to build a tariff wall along the Mississippi River and cut off the East from the West, and in fact a good thing to build a commercial wall around each State. Have New England and the East profited by reason of free trade with the West? The answer to this question points the way, for Canada occupies the same general relation toward the United States as did the West to the East.

In my opinion, it is not possible for freedom of commerce with Canada to injure the United States in the slightest degree. Our industries along all lines are so thoroughly developed and intrenched that serious competition in any line is not to be feared; and as we believe that trade is a good thing and that commerce reasonably conducted enriches all who engage in it, we believe it would be to the great material advantage of both peoples for all time to come to enlarge and expand the liberties of trade, since it would develop and extend all the industries of both countries. And having in mind the assured wonderful future of this great country to our north, developing more remarkably today than ever before, and yet comparatively new in her industries, it is the part of highest statesmanship to cultivate her friendship commercially, socially, and politically.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOUGHERTY].

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Chairman, to even the casual observer it must appear that in these latter days of Republican domination of national affairs we have departed far from those principles and policies of government which were taught and established by the framers of the American Constitution.

There is a manifest disregard for the principles and traditions upon which this Government was founded as the seat of justice, the homestead of liberty and equality, and which made it at once the friend of labor, the inspiration of youth, and the nursery of freemen.

Under Republican leadership we have entered a new era in the history of American politics. Those fixed stars by which the fathers were wont to guide the ship of state have faded from the sky. New and strange theories have come with Republican authority; doubt, discord, and discontent stalk amidst confusion, and nothing seems steadfast or secure.

Through favoritism and class legislation enormous wealth is being gathered into the hands of the favored few, while honest labor is deprived of the fair fruits of toil. Resulting from a system of legalized spoliation of the masses by the few, wealth streams in resplendent glory from the palaces of trust barons, while gaunt poverty lingers in the workman's humble home. Carried to its last analysis, the inevitable result of the continued policy of favoritism and discrimination must force the issue of the bread of charity or the blood of revolution. To the careless and unreflecting or the partisan of Republican politics these words may appear unfounded and absurd, but in fact they are not extravagant.

An honest investigation into the profligate expenditure of the people's money, a study of the policy of protection, which is the policy of plunder and the breeder of trusts and monopolies which find their special friend and protector in the Republican party, will suffice to awaken serious apprehension for the welfare of the people and the stability of our institutions. Upon this question it has been well said:

> For every self-governing people there can be no more momentous question than the question of taxation. It is the question around which all the great battles of freedom have been fought. It is the question out of which grow all the issues of government. Until we settle this question wisely, permanently, justly, we build all other reforms on a foundation of sand.

Passing for the time all other classes and other interests in our country, I take occasion now to express my wonder at the patient submission of the American agriculturists to the gross and unjust discriminations contained in the general policy of the Republican party, embracing the doctrine of protection, which is indirect taxation, and the trusts and monopolies that result therefrom.

The following opinion of Chief Justice Miller on this subject appeals to us with special force:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other bestow it upon favored individuals to aid in private enterprise and to build up private fortunes is none the less robbery because it is done under forms of law and is called taxation.

Of all the people in this country, 10,438,000 of them are engaged in agricultural pursuits, while all other industries employ only 18,885,000. The total farm area in the United States is 841,000,000 acres, an area larger than Germany, England, Scotland, Wales, Austria, France, Japan, Spain, and the Transvaal. Yet the farmers are peculiarly oppressed by the protective tariff, and under it our manufacturers are able to sell farm machinery abroad much cheaper than our own farmers can buy it.

In his last annual report, Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, reviews at length the production and exports of American agricultural products. The increase in the exports of farm products for the half century ending 1901 was from $147,000 to $952,000,000,000—550 per cent. The exports of farm products for the closing decade of the last century was over $700,000,000, and for 1903, over $878,000,000, an amount second only to that of 1901.

Although the consumption of cotton in this country is greater than that of any other country in the world, yet in addition to supplying the home market the South exported last year three and a half billion pounds of cotton, worth $317,000,000.

Of grain and grain products the exports exceeded in value $221,000,000, and in the supply of animals, meats, and meat products the value of our exportations was $211,000,000.

Reviewing the magnitude of agricultural production, after giving the figures of the most important crops, Mr. Wilson states that the value of all farm products not fed to live stock for 1903 considerably exceeded their value in the census year, when it was given as $3,742,000,000.

According to the Department's inventory of farm animals for January, 1903, the value of horses was over $1,000,000,000 and of mules nearly $200,000,000. The value of cattle of all kinds considerably exceeded $1,300,000,000; of sheep, $168,000,000, and of hogs, $365,000,000.

Discussing the balance of trade, the Secretary shows that the favorable balance to the credit of this country is due entirely to the farmers. The balance of trade in favor of farm products during the last fourteen years, no year excepted, aggregated $4,806,000,000. In products other than those of the farm during the same period the balance of trade was adverse to this country to the extent of $865,000,000. Our farmers not only canceled this immense obligation, but placed $3,940,000,000 to the credit of the nation when the books of international exchange were balanced. He concludes that "it is the farmers who have paid the foreign bondholders."

These facts clearly demonstrate that the farmer is the most important and potential factor in American commerce, that the business prosperity of the nation is in no small degree dependent upon him; and yet it is also true that the farmer's interests are comparatively uncared for in the halls of legislation. He is without organization or special representative. He buys in a protected market, at the mercy of trusts, and sells in competition with the world. There is no article of necessity used in his household or upon his farm that is not seized and made the instrument for his plundering and upon which he is not made to pay tribute to trusts and monopolies.

The fact is that the farmer pays approximately 25 per cent more for goods manufactured in American mills, in many instances, than does the foreign consumer for the same article, and this in the face of the great expense of transportation to foreign markets. The tribute he pays to favored and protected industries has enabled at least four corporations to make profits to the amount of over $100,000,000 annually. The inequality and injustice of this policy has given to certain purely manufacturing States which are without material agricultural pursuits—such as Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Michigan, and Massachusetts—a per capita wealth ranging from $559 to more than $1,400, while in the agricultural States—they being the real wealth-producing sections of our country—the per capita wealth does not exceed $300.

When the principle of equal and exact justice to all men and classes was the basic economic principle of this Government, as instituted by the fathers, farming was among the most honorable pursuits, and farmers were the most wealthy and influential class. But since the inauguration of the principle of protection, which is but another term for legalized plundering, a great part of the wealth that the farmer produces in the sweat of his face goes to fill the coffers of protected trusts and monopolies. Granting that the farmer now enjoys some measure of prosperity, yet would he not be infinitely more prosperous if he were treated fairly and on terms of equality with other industries?

It has come to the point that at the very suggestion of legislation affecting finance, stocks, and bonds, trust barons hold up their hands in horror and declare that the mere agitation of such questions threatens the prosperity of the country. But whence comes the voice in the halls of legislation championing the cause of the farmer? No subsidy is proposed for him when his crops wither with blight and drought and his fields yield no profit. No special legislation is sought or pressed, although misfortune and famine may threaten him.

Beginning with the war of the American Revolution and down through all the years of our history, for the purpose of securing and maintaining the rights of freemen, the patriotism of the farmers of the land led them among the first to lay their lives upon the altar of their country as a sacrifice to freedom.

As a class he is just and patriotic. He patiently bears an unjust proportion of the burdens of taxation, and constitutes the most stable if not the most highly cultured class of American citizenship.

At last the conscience of the American people has been awakened to this gross, dishonest, inequitable, and unreasonable discrimination against the farmer, and they are aroused to action.

To-day, from the Great Lakes on the north to the tepid waters that lave the shores of our Southland, from the Atlantic, with its marts of trade and commerce, westward through the plains that lie in measureless sublimity between the great mountains, on to the Golden Gate that guards the Pacific coast, even throughout the length and breadth of our land, wherever honest toil bends above its daily task, the yeomanry of the land are gathering their forces and marshalling their hosts to march against the forces of favoritism and class legislation. And the Democratic party, that came into existence when the morning stars of this Republic first sang together and will endure until oppression is overborne by justice, bears aloft and holds high above all other things—high as the bright star of Hope above the dismal confines of the tomb—the Constitution and the Flag, and emblazoned upon its banners in letters of living and imperishable light appears the slogan, "Equal and exact justice to all men and special privileges to none." By this sign we will conquer.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, there is no subject more important, there is none more deserving of the careful attention of the people, than that of the corruption prevalent in American legislative bodies—in our boards of aldermen and in our State legislatures. This corruption is largely due to the fact that the American people have permitted their representatives to barter away their most valuable privileges. The proceeds of the barter do not, however, go into the public treasury, but into the private pockets of the recreant representatives of the people. This corruption, which of late years has been so prevalent and which seems to be all-pervading, is caused in the main by the special-privilege corporations. The last twenty years has shown a tremendous increase, not merely in the amount of interurban transportation, but also in the consumption of gas and electricity, and in the nation in the increased use of the telegraph and telephone and interstate railroad transportation.

Coincident with this large increase in the volume of traffic, consumption of gas, electricity, and heat there has also, owing to the inventive genius of the country, been a marked reduction in the actual cost of these services. This reduction, however, has not inured to the benefit of the public, but has been almost entirely monopolized by those who have secured possession of franchises which give them exclusive right to supply transportation and other such services. As a result, the margin of profit has been largely increased, and this has suggested to the shrewd, able, and unscrupulous monopolizers of these franchises the process of what has come to be known as "stock watering." Instead of reducing the charges for the services to the public, they have year by year employed a larger number of printing presses to produce stock certificates, the larger part of the value of which is made up of the exclusive privilege to supply these services which the monopolists have obtained from legislative bodies.

As science and invention progresses, there is every reason to believe, and in fact it is almost assured, that the real cost of these services will be constantly reduced, unless there is some change brought about in the relations of the public to these corporations. This will simply result in the issuing, without any valuable consideration being paid therefor—i. e., without any real additional investment of capital—of millions of additional shares of stock upon which these companies will demand that they shall be permitted to pay a "reasonable" dividend.

No relief can come to the people from this condition of affairs until the people themselves shall have direct control over the legislation affecting these special-privilege corporations. That relation and that control can be obtained through what is known as the "direct legislation" system by the institution of the "initiative and referendum."

It is because this question is of such far-reaching importance and is fraught with such large possible benefits to the people; it is because students of municipal government view with alarm the increase of corruption by special-privilege corporations of our legislative bodies, believing that it must ultimately undermine the very existence of government unless it is soon checked, that I desire to incorporate as a part of this brief speech upon this very important subject an address delivered by Dr. William P. Hill, of St. Louis, on this very subject to the students of the State University at Columbia, Mo., and would commend its careful reading to every Member of this House.

APPENDIX.

DIRECT LEGISLATION—THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

[Address of Dr. William P. Hill to the students of the State University, Columbia, Mo.]

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I am glad of this opportunity to address this audience of young men who will soon go forth from this alma mater to become the leading citizens of our Commonwealth of Missouri, to become the leaders of thought and action in their respective communities. I am always glad to meet young men who have had the ambition to leave their homes and firesides and go forth in search of new thoughts and broader impulses.

I am here, as you know, to speak in behalf of direct legislation and to answer the speech made against it before you last fall by Mr. Frederick N. Judson, a corporation lawyer of St. Louis. I take this occasion to pay a tribute to the learning and ability of Mr. Judson as a lawyer and to point out to you that only a man accustomed as he is by long training and practice to grope into the intricate technicalities of corporation law could possibly have made even as plausible a speech as he did against so plain and just a proposition as direct legislation.

I also wish to point out to you that I have no intention whatever of casting any reflections on the personal integrity and motives of Mr. Judson; but I can not refrain from observing that his sympathies as a corporation lawyer are naturally with the clients that have habitually employed him, and that these clients, the franchise-holding corporations of this State, are precisely the ones who have benefited the most by the present era of corruption and bribery in our politics, and that they are most naturally opposed to any reform that will tend to change the present condition of affairs. Every man is naturally opposed to anything that will interfere with his business or occupation. The man engaged in selling liquor is naturally opposed to any prohibition law that will interfere with that business.

The man engaged in conducting a gambling establishment is naturally opposed to any law against gambling, and the corporation that has derived great benefit from the purchase by bribery of legislatures and municipal assemblies is naturally opposed to any system that will make bribery more difficult or impossible, and, furthermore, these franchise corporations, having grown enormously wealthy from the property obtained by them through bribery of the false representatives of the people, are able to employ not only our best legal talent to speak in their behalf, but also to subsidize portions of our press in their efforts to confuse the people on this great subject and to prevent the reform of these conditions.

JUDSON'S OMISSIONS.

Now, Mr. Judson told you in his speech that there has been a growing and persistent popular demand in this country among all classes of citizens and in all our great political parties to establish in our various governments a system known as "direct legislation" by means of the initiative and referendum. These rather formidable words express a very simple idea, and that is a system of government, invented in Switzerland many years ago, by which the people can have at all times a direct control over their government, to wit: A true government of the people, by the people, and for the people. And further, Mr. Judson told you that this agitation resulted in its adoption by the State of Oregon about two years ago. He might have added that it was also adopted several years ago by the States of South Dakota and Utah; that it has been adopted by many cities in our country, notably Boston, San Francisco, and Los Angeles, and others of minor importance; that it has been agitated in the legislatures of nearly every State of the Union, and that its adoption by at least a dozen States in the last two years has only been prevented by the powerful influence of corporate monopolies.

INDORSED BY DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION, 1900.

This great popular demand for this reform resulted in its being incorporated in the national Democratic platform of 1900, and later on, in our own State, the Democratic convention at St. Joseph, in 1902, pledged the Democratic party in the following emphatic resolution: "Resolved, That the Democratic party of Missouri, in convention assembled, hereby pledges its candidates to office to use their votes and influence, and to adopt all proper means to secure the submission to the people of this State of a constitutional amendment providing for the practical application of the principle of direct legislation through the initiative and referendum."

In fulfillment of this pledge to the voters of Missouri by the Democratic party, the last general assembly has submitted such an amendment incorporating this principle in our constitution, to be voted on by the people at the next general election, in November, 1904.

Mr. Judson also told you that the cause of this great popular demand was a growing distrust of our legislatures, and the suspicions and even the disclosures of bribery and corruption. Mr. Judson glides over this part of his subject, evidently realizing the weakness of his position thereon and intent on minimizing as much as possible its importance. He did not tell you that this growing distrust that the people have for our legislatures is fully justified by the awful disclosures of bribery and corruption that have come from every State of our Union and from every city in the country.

He is careful not to tell you that the people have mighty good reason to be suspicious of their legislatures and municipal assemblies; that the people have seen them bribed repeatedly by franchise corporations; that under the influence of this bribery and corruption their rights and their property have been given away to these greedy monopolists. Mr. Judson did not tell you that the people demand a remedy for this awful condition of affairs; that they are tired of being ruled by bribery and corruption; that they know that this condition can not continue without completely destroying the entire fabric of our popular government and converting it into a plutocracy of boodle, by boodle, and for boodle. They know full well, as Mr. Judson told you, that a crisis has been reached in our representative system of government.

But it is not the crisis that Mr. Judson imagines and seems to fear, to wit, that the people may gain a greater control over their Government. The real crisis is whether it shall be completely destroyed by a plutocracy of bribery and corruption. This is the crisis that the great mass of our people see and fear, and this is precisely what they are trying to prevent by finding a remedy, and this is the reason that they are clamoring for this reform, which is the only practical remedy yet offered for this condition.

THE PARAMOUNT ISSUE.

Prof. J. R. Commons, the well-known professor of political economy and sociology, said:

"One of the most important issues before the American people—in fact, the paramount issue to-day—is bribery. No reform movement, no citizens' union, or the like can fully cope with it.

"The referendum is the only complete and specific cure for this condition. It alone goes to the source of corruption. It deprives lawmakers and executives of their monopoly of legislation. After the adoption of the referendum they can no longer deliver the goods. The secret ballot, official primaries, civil-service reform, proportional representation, are all needful and good in their way, but they still leave to a few representatives the monopoly of government and the power to sell. If they could all be adopted, the immense interest dependent on legislation will not use less but more money and will still control. With the referendum, however, the use of money will be practically abolished."

Mr. Judson, in his speech, gave you a very concise and able presentation of the gradual development of democratic tendencies in the constitutional history of Missouri. I was much surprised that he did this and still more surprised at the conclusion that he drew therefrom. He told you "that the first constitution of 1820 was adopted by the convention called under the 'enabling act' of Congress, and was not submitted to the people at all for ratification."

In this constitution there was no provision for amendment by popular vote, but under its provisions amendments were authorized to be made by a two-thirds vote of both houses of the general assembly, ratified by a two-thirds vote of the next succeeding general assembly. The constitution of 1865 was formed by a convention called by the general assembly, although there was no authority in the constitution of 1820 providing for such a convention. This constitution was, however, submitted to a vote of the people, the constitution itself expressly providing that it should not go into effect until adopted by the people. This constitution of 1865, though greatly more democratic in its tendencies than the old constitution of 1820, still failed to keep abreast with the spirit of the times, and a new convention was called in 1875 to adopt a still more radical constitution, that should be more in harmony with the popular will.

This constitution of 1875 differs radically from the preceding, and forcibly illustrates the modern tendency of imposing detailed restraints upon the legislative power and upon the taxing and bond-issuing powers of municipalities. But the most significant development in these constitutions was the introduction for the first time in our State of the principle of the referendum; that is, the reference to the popular vote. Not only does it provide for amendments to the constitution itself by popular vote, but it empowers counties, municipalities, and school districts to increase by popular vote their tax rate, and to issue bonds.

An essentially new feature in American constitutional law was the authorization of cities to frame their own charters and adopt them by popular vote, which has now been exercised and is now enjoyed by St. Louis and Kansas City. Under section 26 of article 12, the principle of the referendum is directly applied in providing that no act of the general assembly creating any banks, except those of deposit or discount, should go into effect until submitted to the qualified voters at the next general election, and approved by a majority. The same principle is also applied to the removal of a county seat, changes in the county territory, and in the provisions for township organization.

IT IS EVOLUTIONARY.

Thus we see that the history of our State constitution shows a slow and gradual evolution toward this principle of popular control of the Government by means of the referendum, and I was very much surprised that after Mr. Judson had so carefully and ably pointed out to you this gradual evolution that he should tell you that the further development of this principle, which is sought to be established by the present amendment now before the people, was in its nature a revolution. The very definition of evolution is a gradual and slow change toward a more and more perfect condition. An organic, peaceful development taking place along well-established lines. A revolution, on the contrary, implies a complete upheaval, violent and sudden in its nature. I leave you and the people of Missouri to judge whether the adoption of this constitutional amendment is not simply one more step in the gradual unfolding or peaceful evolution of our constitutional government. Simply the extension to statutory law of a principle already successfully applied to our constitutional law.

But this argument that the proposed change is revolutionary is not new in our State. It has been heard before. Did my time permit, I would show you by ample quotations that men like Mr. Judson have used that same expression against every change that has ever taken place in our constitution of Missouri. The same arguments were used against our constitution of 1875, and against our constitution of 1865.

SPECIAL PRIVILEGED CORPORATIONS OF COURSE OPPOSE.

Holders of special privileges and monopoly are, by nature, opposed to change of any kind, and whenever the people have tried to introduce a reform and improvement in their government they have invariably found these same gentlemen standing opposed to them and saying this is dangerous, this is revolutionary. Mr. Judson and his clients are representatives of a class, the conservative class, the self-satisfied, contented class, the beneficiaries of conditions existing in their time. The creed of these gentlemen can be summed up in the following words: "We are the greatest nation on earth; we surpass all other nations in richness and goodness; we are the only people up to date or a little ahead; no other nation has ever put Providence under such deep obligation; our standards of righteousness are so perfect that everything that we do is about right; we have the highest ideals, which we might soon overtake if we could only clip their wings a little." We see men exactly similar to these gentlemen in all the pages of human history. Go back a little farther in the history of our country and we see other Mr. Judsons opposing the adoption of the Federal Constitution, opposing the adoption of our republican form of government, on the ground that the people were not fit to be intrusted with the sovereign power, and that there should be a ruling class to exercise the power of government.

If you will read Adams's History of the Constitution of the United States, you will see that Alexander Hamilton and his followers used those same arguments against the establishment of our American Republic; that these gentlemen were in favor of having the Senators elected for life, and also the President, and of having a limited monarchy, like England. Go back a little further in the history of the human race and you will find these same gentlemen insisting on the divine rights of kings and opposing the establishment of parliamentary government in any form as a dangerous invention and revolutionary in its tendencies. I have no doubt that the action of the feudal barons in forcing the Magna Charta itself from King John was looked upon by men of this class as a most awful revolution. In fact, we have only to scratch an opponent of the referendum a little to find an opponent of popular government in any form.

FROM DESPOTISM TO DEMOCRACY.

The whole history of the human race has been a gradual development from the despotic and absolute government toward a more and more democratic form. There has never been any other struggle. The whole history of the human race is a history of struggle between two opposing groups of forces. On the one side we have had the ideas of justice, of equity, of liberty, of brotherhood, of altruism, and of true democracy; and on the other side we have had the ideas of pride, of selfishness, of greed, of special privilege, of aristocracy, and of despotism. These two groups of forces have met in deadly conflict from time immemorial. Every incident in human history has been merely a part of this great struggle; one battle in this great war; one variation on this great theme. Abraham Lincoln, that these gentlemen are fond of quoting at times, now that he is dead, said:

"THE ETERNAL STRUGGLE"—LINCOLN.

"There is an issue that will continue when the poor tongues of Judge Douglas and myself shall be silent. It is the eternal struggle between these two, right and wrong, throughout the world. They are the two principles that have struggled since the beginning of time. The one is the common right of humanity and the other is the divine right of kings. It is the same principle in whatever shape it develops."

When Moses led a race of slaves from bondage; when a handful of Greeks turned back the multitudinous hosts of the Persian tyrant on the plain of Marathon; when Leonidas and his Spartan band sacrificed their lives for their country in the defiles of Thermopylæ; when the heroic Spartacus exclaimed to his ragged followers, "Let greed tremble in all his palaces, let the oppressor shudder to think that the oppressed may have their turn;" when Demosthenes hurled his defiance at Philip; when Socrates calmly taught the truth in the face of death; when Galileo held aloft a new torch of science; when Arnold Winklereid paved the way for his countrymen by the sacrifice of his own life; when Mirabeau thundered against a debauched monarchy; when Patrick Henry exclaimed, "Give me liberty or give me death;" when Washington guided the ragged heroes of Valley Forge to a new Republic; when Lincoln extended freedom to an humble race; aye, when the Saviour of mankind, himself, laid down his life for his ideals of faith and love—these, all these, were only fighting battles in this one all-embracing conflict that has its sequel in our day, and that will continue as long as one wrong remains to be righted; as long as one injustice remains on top of earth; and not alone on history's great page does this struggle take place.

It invades the heart and soul of every individual. Sooner or later everyone is called upon to choose on which side he will take his stand, and as one or the other of these principles gains the ascendancy in his nature does he line himself with the forces of iniquity or the armies of righteousness.

"Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide
In the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side,
Some great cause. God's new messiah, bringing each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand and the sheep upon the right,
And the choice goes by forever twixt that darkness and that light.

Careless seems the great avenger, history's pages but record
One death grapple in the darkness twixt old systems and the word,
Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne,
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow keeping watch above his own."

And, my friends, this struggle for democracy in government, this struggle for the right of the people to control their government is simply a part of this great conflict, and at every step of its progress it has encountered these same opponents that stand before you to-day opposing this next step in the triumphant march of liberty and justice, and whenever these gentleman have been driven from one position to another, in spite of all the accumulated facts of human experience, they take their stand on the next vantage ground and say another step is dangerous and revolutionary. You must advance no further.

But Mr. Judson seems to intimate that direct legislation is in conflict with the Federal Constitution, and that if adopted by the people of this State that an effort will be made to have it declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of this State or by that of the United States. Several jurists, who have been well known as friends of the corporate interests, have written articles setting forth this view. In each case the wish was father to the thought.

This is all based on section 4 of Article IV of the Federal Constitution, which guarantees to every State in the Union a republican form of government. When the United States Constitution was adopted this question was thoroughly discussed, and the meaning of the phrase "republican form of government" was decided to be a government in which the political power was inherent and vested in the people themselves in accordance with our Declaration of Independence, as distinguished from a monarchical form of government in which the political power was vested in a king or aristocracy—in other words, that the Federal Constitution would not permit the establishment of a monarchy in any of the States of the Union.

The idea that this section would one day be used to defeat the very purpose it was intended for; that it would be used by a technical quibbling, or play upon the words "democratic" and "republican," to deny the right of the people to a more perfect control over their Government, never entered into the heads of the framers of the Constitution.

The idea that the extension of the initiative and referendum to statutory law, as it already is to constitutional law, should constitute a destruction of the republican form of government, would never enter the mind of anybody but a corporation lawyer, accustomed by long training to discover hair-splitting technicalities to defeat the ends of justice and the expressed will of the people.

Fortunately there is no reason to fear such contingency. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Minor v. Haperset (21 Wallace, 162), said that no particular government was designated as republican in the Constitution, and since Mr. Judson delivered his speech this very point has been justly and ably decided by the supreme court of the State of Oregon.

The court said: "The initiative and referendum amendment does not abolish or destroy the republican form of government or substitute another in its place. The representative character of the government still remains. The people have simply reserved to themselves a larger share of the legislative power, but they have not overthrown the republican form of government or substituted another in its place. The government is still divided into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, the duties of which are discharged by representatives selected by the people."

THE PEOPLE INTENSELY INTERESTED.

The next objection that Mr. Judson claims against the referendum is that the people do not take interest enough to vote on measures, and he cites a few cases where only 40 per cent of the voters voted on constitutional amendments in this State. Mr. Judson is careful not to cite cases where the vote on questions was greater than the vote on candidates, as in Boston, where a question of great public interest drew a larger vote than was cast even in the Presidential election, and recently in Chicago where the vote on public ownership was very large and convincing.

When the question presented to the people is one in which they do not feel any interest whatever, or is worded in such a way as to be confusing or obscure, it is evident that the vote would not be large. But where a live question that is agitating the popular mind is presented, the vote has been all that could be desired.

But this feature, far from being a defect in the referendum, is one of its many advantages. It is an advantage that those unable to read the constitutional amendments, or unable to understand their import, do not vote upon them, leaving the question to be decided by the more intelligent portion of the population. Under the referendum the ignorant and indifferent disfranchise themselves without the necessity of passing any law against them. The percentage that Mr. Judson complains of is easily explained by this fact; but even this percentage shows that the constitutional amendments were passed by an average of 200,000 voters in our State. Is it not better to have the laws made by 200,000 of our more intelligent and patriotic citizens than to have them passed by corruption and bribery in a small boodle legislature?

But Mr. Judson misses the main point of the question. He has failed to show that the people have ever adopted by popular vote a bad law or have ever voted down a good one. The opponents of direct legislation will have to show us examples where the judgment of the people was faulty or unjust. Whereas, on the other hand, we can show that the mistakes of our legislatures have filled volumes of our statute books. We can show that legislatures have repeatedly passed laws ridiculous, absurd, corrupt, and inefficient. How often have our legislatures passed laws that were dead letters in their very inception, that were unconstitutional, and that it has taken all the acumen of astute lawyers like Mr. Judson to unravel. There is no fact more clearly demonstrated in our political life under the present system than the absolute incapacity and inefficiency of our legislatures. This fact is notorious to every citizen of Missouri.

THIS PRINCIPLE ENTIRELY DEMOCRATIC.

Mr. Judson objects that the conception of a democracy is only practical among a limited number of people and over a limited territory, and he quotes the founders of the Republic, and notably Thomas Jefferson. These gentlemen are fond of quoting these great men after they are dead. We remember distinctly that Thomas Jefferson, while living, was called an anarchist and a dangerous revolutionist by just such men as these. Now, Thomas Jefferson said that the New England town meeting, which was the direct application of pure democracy in government, was the most perfect system ever devised by man, and he deeply regretted that some way could not be found by which its benefits could be extended over a greater territory. This is precisely what has been accomplished by the invention of the initiative and referendum.

In the days of Jefferson communications were imperfect and uncertain, but in the present day of the railroad, the telegraph, the telephone, and the modern newspaper, discussion can take place as readily over a whole State as in the days of Jefferson in a single township. Abraham Lincoln also said, "This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world?"

Mr. Judson further told you that though the people, in his judgment, are not competent to decide great political questions, that yet they are eminently able to determine the fitness of candidates for office. Now, I think that there is nothing so well established in our political history as the fact that under the present system the people are absolutely powerless and unable to elect honest men to office. The recent disclosures of bribery and corruption in our State have demonstrated this beyond question.

When under the present system we find two-thirds of the St. Louis municipal assembly indicted for bribery and corruption, and a great number of our legislators and senators in the hands of our sheriff, when it is a notorious fact and common knowledge throughout this State that only a small part of all the facts of corruption have been brought to light we can hardly agree with Mr. Judson that the present system has been a conspicuous success in electing honest men to office.

One more objection of Mr. Judson is a sentimental one, and that is that we must not change the representative system of government founded by our revolutionary forefathers. I yield to no man in my respect for the great frounders of our Republic; but I am thoroughly convinced that they would have been the first to have ridiculed the idea that they were establishing a system in the eighteenth century to meet the requirements and conditions of the twentieth century; that they were establishing a system that should be held sacred and not subject to change.

The best proof we have of this is that during the first ten years after the adoption of the Federal Constitution the founders of it themselves changed it over ten times. Perfection is the only thing that can not be improved by change, and if Mr. Judson can show that the present system is perfection itself then we will agree with him that any change would be injurious.

DIRECT LEGISLATION THE REAL REMEDY.

But the great defect in Mr. Judson's argument is the fact that he sets forth no adequate remedy for the present era of corruption in our politics. He admits that this corruption constitutes a grave peril, requiring our most thoughtful consideration and our most patriotic endeavors; but the only remedy that he suggests is that we must elect honest men to office. The people have tried to do that for years and years and always with the same signal failure. We have had committees of a hundred and committees of fifty, citizens' leagues and public welfare commissions, of which Mr. Judson himself has been a member, and always with the same result.

There may have been a time when our primary elections had in them some element of fairness and decency, but my memory does not go back far enough to recall it. They are now so malodorous that no man with a modicum of self-respect can attend them. They are planned and conducted with that end in view. The political boss wants results which the presence of decent citizens might defeat. Naturally, the people have come to see that it is the system itself that must be changed, rather than the men. The Direct Legislationists claim that under the present conditions it is quite impossible to elect honest men to office. Candidates for an office can be divided into two classes, the honest and the dishonest, and under the present system the dishonest man can win the race against the honest man every time.

Take, for instance, the house of delegates in St. Louis. The salary of that office for the term of two years is $600. It costs the candidate in political expenses and party assessments between $1,600 and $2,000 to secure his election. Now, an honest man, whose conscience will not permit him to be bribed after election, can see at a glance that he will be the loser of $1,000 or more in addition to his time and labor for the honor of serving his country in the house of delegates. There are few people patriotic enough to make that sacrifice; but the dishonest man, who knows that thousands of dollars can be made by being bribed into betraying the interests confided to his care after he is elected, will not hesitate to spend money sufficient to secure his election. Similar conditions control the elections to nearly every other office in our State. Is it any wonder that under this system rascality should be in the majority in our municipal assemblies and in our State legislature? Now, if we remove the power of the legislature to sell anything without the reviewing vote of the people, then bribery will cease, because nobody will pay money to those who can not deliver the goods.

When the acts of the legislature are liable to be reviewed by the people, then the opportunities for corruption and rascality will have passed away. Under such conditions a rascal will not pay out his money to secure an office of which the salary is small and in which there is no opportunity for him to steal. Under the conditions brought about by the initiative and referendum we will not need to eliminate the rascals from our politics. They will eliminate themselves, because the offices will no longer have any attraction for them. And after all, my friends, it is a plain business proposition. My agent is faithful to me as long as I can control him, veto his acts, and discharge him if I find that he is not working to my interests. If I elected an agent for a term of four years, and during that time had absolutely no control over him whatever; if he had an absolute power of attorney to do what he liked with my property and my interests, it is a self-evident proposition that in the majority of cases I would have no property and no interests to dispose of at the end of his term, and yet this is precisely our present system of political life.

Is it any wonder that our grand juries and our prosecuting attorneys have been kept busy? Direct legislationists claim that when irresponsible and uncontrolled power is placed in the hands of the average man it is not doubtful but certain to be abused. We know that the only remedy is to change the system that has produced these results. We must borrow a biblical precept. We must lead our legislators not into temptation, but deliver them from evil. To recapitulate briefly, all classes of citizens, including the opponents of direct legislation, admit that the present era of corruption and bribery in our politics constitutes a grave national peril; that we are confronted by a condition that requires a remedy; but when it comes to suggesting a remedy our opponents have nothing to offer except what has been tried over and over again and found a failure, whereas direct legislationists offer a remedy that is complete and specific and that experience has demonstrated to be a cure for this condition.

PEOPLE WISER THAN THEIR REPRESENTATIVES.

The famous Swiss statesman, Numa Droz, ex-President of the Republic of Switzerland, said:

"Under the influence of the referendum a profound change has come over the spirit both of Parliament and people. It has abolished the corruption which previously menaced our Republic. The people have generally shown themselves wiser than the politicians."

Hon. Charles N. Herreid, governor of South Dakota, Republican, said:

"Since the referendum has been a part of our constitution we have had no charter mongers or railroad speculators, no boodling schemes submitted to our legislature. There has been no necessity of having recourse to the referendum. Its presence in the constitution alone has sufficed to abolish corruption."

And after all, my friends, this question of direct legislation is a very simple one. It is a struggle to bring about the same things that our revolutionary forefathers fought and died for. If their Declaration of Independence announced to the world an immortal and imperishable truth—that all political power is inherent in and vested in the people themselves; that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed—then direct legislation is true because it is simply a method to perfect and enlarge the control of the people over their government. No man has ever denied these great truths without a selfish motive in his heart. Kings have denied them while proclaiming their divine right because they were riding on the backs of their people. Aristocrats, nobles, and monopolists have denied them because their hands were steeped in special privilege. Boodle politicians have denied them because their fingers clutched the thousand-dollar bills of bribery money in their pockets. Corporation attorneys deny them because it interferes with the interests of their clients, from whom they derive their sustenance and who pay them for their technicalities. But the great mass of the plain, honest people love these principles all the more on account of the enemies they have made. The direct legislationists are simply trying to realize what our forefathers dreamed of, and but vaguely approached. We want, not only the independence of the nation, not only the independence of the State, but something far more glorious still—the absolute sovereignty and independence of the individual.

We do not wish to destroy the representative Government established by our forefathers; but we do wish to keep it from becoming a misrepresentative Government. We claim that under present conditions it only represents the will of a few political bosses and boodlers and misrepresents the great mass of our people.

We claim that there is only one use for law—but one excuse for government, and that is the preservation of liberty and justice. To give to each man his own: to secure to the farmer what he produces from the soil; to the mechanic what he invents and makes; to the artist what he creates, and to the thinker the right to express his thoughts.

We claim that a crisis indeed has been reached in our representative Government, a struggle to preserve it from becoming a plutocracy of boodle, bribery, and corruption.

THE PEOPLE MUST PURIFY GOVERNMENT.

We claim that it is absolutely necessary for the people to arouse themselves and purify their Government; that the time has come when all good citizens should pray, as did the immortal Lincoln on the battlefield of Gettysburg, to dedicate ourselves anew to the task left unfinished by the heroes and martyrs of liberty, to draw from these honored dead a new inspiration for the cause to which they gave the last measure of devotion, to highly resolve that this nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom, and that this Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

We wish the people of Missouri to know that what we are struggling for is what the great and good in all ages have struggled for. That we are fighting the battles they would fight if present in our time. That we are the heirs of all that glorious past, of all those glorious victories that have been consecrated by the blood and sacrifice of all that was best and noblest in human annals. That back of us stand, urging us onward, ever onward, and wishing us godspeed in our work, all that long line of patriots and martyrs, prophets and heroes, who have struggled to uplift the human race. Our cause is the sacred and holy cause of human progress.

Our ultimate victory is certain because, disregarding all trivial considerations, it strikes deeper and appeals to the conscience of the human race; because it beckons mankind to a higher and nobler destiny where dishonesty and vice shall no longer rule in our legislatures, where corruption and blind party prejudice shall no longer preside over our judicial bench, where on the ever broadening horizon of a glorious future shall dawn the glad sunshine of honesty and justice, and where at last the bars of ignorance and selfishness and greed which sever shall be fused in one humanity forever.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield the remainder of my time except one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. HAMILTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How much time has been consumed on the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has five minutes to his credit.

Mr. LLOYD. I think that this side of the House is being charged with interruptions. I should be very sorry, under the circumstances, if anything of that kind is done, because I should like my friend from Virginia to have ten minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will ask unanimous consent, if permissible, that the gentleman from Virginia have that time.

Mr. LLOYD. Then I will yield the gentleman from Virginia ten minutes and retain one minute for myself.

Mr. HAMILTON. If thirty minutes was fixed by the House as the time for general debate in the committee, it seems to me that the debate will have to be closed in that time.

Mr. LLOYD. But interruptions, I presume, are not to be counted as speeches?

Mr. PAYNE. We can not change the time fixed for general debate except in the House. I suggest that the gentleman from Virginia can get five minutes on an amendment when we take up the bill under the five-minute rule; but the order of the House can not be changed now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, a number of gentlemen on this side of the House have devoted such patriotism and intelligence as they possess for a good part of this session of Congress in efforts to secure the passage of some bill to relieve a portion of our agriculturists who are suffering more from unjust taxation than any other class of American citizens. I mean the tobacco growers. I want the tobacco growers to understand, Mr. Chairman, why the exertion on the part of so many Members on this side of the House in their behalf has resulted in nothing more than exciting interest among Members generally, and perhaps in arousing the conscience of the country, upon this question, which is so important to them.

Mr. Chairman, the intelligence of no man, the patriotism of no man, the learning of no man is worth anything upon this floor except so far as it may serve to rouse the conscience of the country. That was demonstrated on Saturday last when the vote was taken after the great speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. Under the rules adopted here and as construed and enforced by the Speaker and his coterie of bosses, this House has become a moot court, in which the only privilege left to a vast majority of its Members is to make a speech for or against some legislation which is a foregone conclusion.

Every bill which brings forth the poor pretense of a debate is predestined and its fate determined by one of the several autocrats in whose favor the Republican majority of the House have abdicated our power and our functions. A number of us introduced bills for the relief of the tobacco growers. Those bills went to the Committee on Ways and Means, and were by that committee referred to a subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], one of the elect, was made chairman.

After brushing aside those bills which were prepared by gentlemen who are familiar with the subject and familiar with the conditions which surround the tobacco growers, the gentleman from Pennsylvania prepared a bill of his own, or, rather, had one prepared by the head of one of the subordinate bureaus of this Government. That bill, Mr. Chairman, was stripped of every provision which was distasteful to the domestic tobacco trust or the foreign governmental combinations which have been oppressing the tobacco growers. This poor pretense of a relief bill, which, in my opinion, was only in the most insignificant degree beneficial to the tobacco planters, was held up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and was only reported on terms.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, with the cynical candor of a man possessed of autocratic power and habituated to its illegitimate exercise, notified the friends of the tobacco growers that unless they agreed in advance not to offer any amendment to his bill not even that would be reported to this House by the Committee on Ways and Means; but that it, along with the other bills upon this subject, would be relegated to the limbo of still-born legislation. We recognized, Mr. Chairman, that we were in the hands of the Philistines, and that in order to get this infinitesimal relief for the tobacco growers we had to accept this condition, so humiliating to the dignity of this House and such an outrage upon our rights as Members of this body and the rights of our constituents.

Mr. Chairman, when Oliver Cromwell cleared out the Parliament House with a file of soldiers it was no whit more tyrannical, no whit more subversive of the fundamental principles of representative government than this assumption on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania of a power which should only be exercised by a majority of this House—namely, the power to legislate.

Even after we had agreed to the condition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he had reported his bill, though it was a privileged measure and he could have called it up any moment, it stood on the Calendar from day to day until the time had passed when there was any hope that the Senate would take it up and act upon it, and it is now in a Senate Committee, where it will remain for this session, and the tobacco growers will be deprived of the small relief it carried for another year.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the time will soon come when the Democratic party will restore to this House its ancient privileges [loud applause], when the representatives of the people can meet here and freely and deliberately discuss the interests of their constituents, and when the grasping hand of the Executive and the tyranny of the bosses will no longer be permitted to usurp the powers which should reside in the majority of this House. [Renewed applause.]

Then, and not until then, will we have in very truth a government of the people. Then, sir, will the rule of the plutocrats and the dominance in our affairs of the trusts and monopolies pass away forever, having left behind one of the most disgraceful chapters in American history, when money was elevated above men and women; when an aristocracy of wealth was created and built up, and when a predatory gang of monetary bandits and vampires were permitted to prey at will upon the misfortunes and necessities of the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, the comfort and prosperity of our people depend largely upon the policy of the Government with regard to its internal improvements.

This is a great country. Extending from ocean to ocean and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, with a population of upward of eighty millions of the most intelligent and progressive people on earth, the country's development and the prosperity of the people are worthy of the highest consideration by Representatives in Congress.

OUR INTERNAL COMMERCE.

Our internal commerce amounts to the amazing total of over $20,000,000,000 a year. This estimate is upon the basis of but one transaction between producer and consumer, and the total has more than doubled in the past ten years. The volume of manufactures of the United States is more than twice as much as that of Great Britain. Who can tell what our manufactures will be ten or twenty years hence? In agricultural products this country is far in advance of any other, and its mineral resources exceed those of any land. To keep pace with this great increasing commerce we should provide liberal appropriations for river and harbor improvements. An examination of the appropriations for the past ten years discloses that expenditures for all branches of the Government have largely increased from year to year.

APPROPRIATIONS COMPARED.

The appropriations of the present session of the Fifty-eighth Congress aggregate the enormous sum of $781,574,629.99, which includes large increases for the army and navy establishments, and this at a time when we are at peace with all the world. During the four years of the Cleveland Administration, 1894–1897, the total expenditures amounted to $1,758,699,216.43, while during the four years of the McKinley Administration, 1898–1901, the total expenditures were $2,430,316,390.29, an increase in four years under McKinley of $671,617,173.86. During the Administration of President Roosevelt the expenditures increased to the unprecedented sum of $2,641,724,019.18. This is more than $211,000,000 more than the entire expenses of the McKinley Administration, although the Spanish-American war occurred during that time, and $883,000,000 more than during the Cleveland Administration.

RESULT OF REPUBLICAN POLICY.

In order to carry out the policy of the Republican party it is necessary to increase greatly the expenditures for the Army and Navy. This has been done at the expense of the much-needed internal improvements. From the enormous sums of money expended to maintain the Republican policy of colonial possessions the business and labor interests of the country receive no benefits; while the improvement of our rivers and harbors not only inures to the benefit of the entire country, but such improvements are absolutely essential for the needs of our rapidly increasing internal and foreign trade. The completion of many improvements already initiated and the erection of needed public buildings would give employment to thousands of our workmen at home and would greatly facilitate the business of the country. No provision has been made during this session for the completion of the vast number of river and harbor improvements, public buildings, and aids to navigation that have been recommended to this Congress with the expectation of favorable consideration.

BLACK ROCK HARBOR, NEW YORK.

Among the many improvements that have been considered by the River and Harbor Committee of this House is one for the improvement of Black Rock Harbor, New York. The object of the proposed improvement is to enable the deep-draft vessels of the Lakes to reach the quiet, deep waters below the shoals and rapids at the head of the Niagara River, and thus give to general commerce and all the territory lying between Lake Erie and Niagara Falls the great benefit that would result from better harbor facilities. From the reports of the Secretary of War it appears that the matter was referred to Maj. Thomas W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, for a preliminary examination. His report to Gen. G. L. Gillespie, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on October 1, 1902, states, among other things:

It is my opinion that the work as outlined is not only worthy of being undertaken by the United States, but ought to be undertaken, and it is advisable to do so with the least possible delay.

PRESENT PROJECT.

In 1888 a project was adopted for improving the Niagara River from Lake Erie to Tonawanda. Stated briefly, this was to remove rocks and shoals in the river so as to make a channel deep enough for vessels of 16 feet draft at mean river stage. This has been largely accomplished, but of late years the river and lake levels have been so low that the actual draft in the completed channel has been limited to about 14 feet.

This project is by no means a satisfactory one, and for several reasons: It does not furnish a remedy for the swiftness of water through the gorge, which runs from 4 to 7 miles per hour; it accommodates only boats of the smaller class, the old-fashioned freight-carrying boats of the Lakes, which are becoming fewer and fewer every year, and it can not be extended and enlarged to overcome the swiftness and shallowness of the channel without excavating wide and deep channels through the natural rock dam at the head of the river, which would lower the waters of Lake Erie, to the general detriment of all the cities and the commerce on the lake. In order to accomplish the object aimed at—of bringing this portion of this great navigable river into the Great Lakes system without detriment to the commerce of the Lakes—an entirely new project must be adopted.

PROPOSED PLAN OF IMPROVEMENT.

The proposed plan of improvement is to widen Black Rock Harbor to its original width by removing the wall that separates it from the Erie Canal, which once formed a part of it, thus making it from 250 to 500 feet wide, instead of about 125 feet wide, as at present; the resultant waterway then to be deepened sufficiently to accommodate the largest vessels of the Lakes with a lock at its downstream end sufficient to overcome the fall of the river. The lift of the lock would be about 5 feet, and it would be situated near the lower end of Squaw Island, in a position convenient of access by vessels navigating either channel of the river below the shoals and rapids. This canal and lock will enable all vessels, of whatever draft or width, engaged in lake commerce to pass from Lake Erie into the splendid natural harbor of the Niagara River below the shoals and rapids at its head.

JUSTIFICATION OF THE IMPROVEMENT.

This is believed to be a justifiable improvement for several reasons:

Because of its central geographical situation, its water transportation by the Great Lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Welland Canal, its many trunk lines of railroad, its vicinity to the coal fields of Pennsylvania, and especially to the great water power of Niagara Falls, this general locality between Lake Erie and Niagara Falls is rapidly becoming a very extensive and important manufacturing center, and its future in this regard is almost boundless if proper advantage is taken of natural conditions and necessary and reasonable improvements in these natural conditions are made.

The highest industrial development of the country demands that all along this Niagara frontier there shall be assembled conveniently and without hindrance transportation by lake, river, canal, and rail, and the power generated at Niagara Falls. The benefits to result from the proposed improvements are so great, so needed, so undoubted, and so immediate, and of such general usefulness that I have no hesitation in recommending that they be undertaken by the Government.

Furthermore, in this report Maj. Theodore A. Bingham, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, in showing the necessity of providing for deep-draft vessels, says:

The depth of the channel adopted is 23 feet at mean lake level, or the level of the Black Rock Harbor-Erie Canal waterway.

This depth is adopted because it is the depth established for all improvements of navigation for the deepest-draft vessels at Buffalo Harbor. The fluctuation of water level, due to ordinary winds and other ordinary causes, at the Buffalo end of Lake Erie ranges from 3 feet below mean level to 3 feet above that level. The maximum fluctuation due to high winds ranges from 5 feet below mean level to 8 feet above that level. These maxima are, however, of infrequent occurrence and need not be considered in this connection. The maximum draft of vessels on the Great Lakes must now be taken at approximately 21 feet, and the draft of the class of large vessels generally, excepting those of extreme size and draft, as 18 to 19 feet.

This is well shown in the following excerpts from articles on "Lake cargo records," published in The Marine Review, Cleveland, Ohio, August 6 and 13, 1903:

"The William Edenborn, of the Pittsburg Steamship Company, on August 1, 1903, smashed her own record, and, of course, all other records besides, in moving from Escanaba to South Chicago 8,807 gross tons, or 9,864 net tons, of iron ore. With this cargo she drew 20 feet 9 inches aft and 20 feet 5 inches forward.

"The Manila, of the Pittsburg Steamship Company, carried 7,820 gross, or 8,758 net tons, of ore on even draft of 18 feet 10½ inches."

The Manila, while a tow barge, typifies the class of large lake vessels, both steam and barge, ranging from 420 to 470 feet in length over all, with a beam of 50 feet—the typical large modern vessels on the Great Lakes.

The draft of 19 feet may be taken as the ruling draft of this typical deep-draft vessel. The channel 23 feet deep at mean level would have a depth at low water of 3 feet less, or 20 feet. It is desirable and advisable for safe navigation to have at least 1 foot of water under a vessel's keel at all times; so the low-water depth of 20 feet would fully meet the conditions required for fair navigation for the typical large deep-draft lake vessel under all but extraordinary low-water conditions, which occur at infrequent intervals of a few hours each.

The channel would also be navigable, except under low-water conditions, lower than 2 feet below mean level (which do not prevail except during a part of the seasons of low water in the Great Lakes), for the four large vessels of the Edenborn type, known as the "big four." These vessels are 498 feet long over all, with 52 feet beam and, when fully loaded, of about 21 feet draft.

The report further states that the improvement will cost $4,500,000.

IMPROVEMENT OF ERIE CANAL.

Mr. Chairman, the State of New York has expended $56,000,000 on the Erie, Oswego, and Champlain canals. The people, by an overwhelming majority, have authorized the enlargement of those canals, so as to provide for barges of 1,000 tons capacity. For this purpose there has been appropriated by the State $101,000,000. This work, the greatest of its kind ever undertaken, with the exception of the Panama Canal, is to be done entirely by the State of New York, and the commerce of the country will be immensely benefited thereby.

In order, however, that commerce shall share to the fullest extent in the benefits of this great enterprise, the Government should begin at once the improvement of the Black Rock Harbor, so that it may be completed and open to navigation when the canal is finished. The improvement of this harbor is not a local but a national undertaking. Terminal facilities are absolutely necessary if trade is to benefit properly from the great work of the State of New York.

CANADIAN ROUTES.

At the present time a great volume of American trade reaches the seaboard by way of Canada, and unless prompt action be taken to better the existing conditions on this side much more will be diverted, to the detriment of American commerce. The completion of the 22-foot canal from Georgian Bay by way of the Ottawa River to the St. Lawrence, on which work is to soon begin, will shorten the distance to the seaboard and give Canada a tremendous advantage over the United States. In order to overcome this advantage this Government must provide facilities that will enable American commerce to proceed by American routes. Our commerce should be carried in American bottoms; it should proceed to the seaboard by American routes; it should be handled by American citizens, so that American interests above all else should be benefited. Of what avail, if we squander with lavish hand untold millions for the benefit of distant and alien peoples, if our own country is to be neglected?

REPUBLICAN NEGLECT AND REMEDY.

It is unfortunate that the exigencies of an approaching national campaign have made it necessary for the Republican party to adjourn Congress at a date unprecedented in our history, and thus postpone action upon many important matters. It is more unfortunate that the policies to which the country has been committed by the party in power have resulted in the expenditure of sums much in excess of what would be required by an economical administration of the public affairs. Distant peoples and lands have been carefully looked after by this Congress, while much that would be of great value to all of our people has been neglected.

Believing that the true mission of this country is not so much to bring every less fortunate and uncivilized people up to our standard, but that it is to bring peace, prosperity, and happiness to the people of this country, it is my earnest hope that the country will speedily come back to its original and fundamental policies, which will best be furthered by a great Democratic victory in the coming campaign. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in concluding the debate on this side you will pardon me for calling attention to the fact that the bill before the House is to provide a Delegate from Alaska. [Laughter and applause.] I will further say, sir, to my fellows on this side of the Chamber, the minority members of the Committee on Territories have carefully investigated this bill and have done the best they could, in connection with the majority, and have presented the most perfect bill possible with the light that could be obtained. I believe that every Member of this body, either Democrat or Republican, ought to vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, much has been said, and more has been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and in the press, relative to White House expenditures. Before discussing this subject I want to express my sympathy to the Democratic party in their hour of turmoil, confusion, and distress, wandering about like a rudderless ship encountering shoals and rocks, tossed about on the high seas of disruption, without issue or hope of reaching an agreement on either candidate or platform.

For the information of those who have cherished the hope of a reconciliation of the Democratic party, I read to you from the Washington Post of April 24, reporting Bryan's Chicago speech on the New York platform, the reorganized Democratic party and its prospective candidate—the party eulogized and defended by the eloquent gentleman from New York, Mr. COCKRAN, in his two hour free-trade speech of last Saturday:

PLATFORM FOR A DODGER.

The New York platform is a dishonest platform, fit only for a dishonest party. No one but an artful dodger would stand upon it. The submission of such a platform to the voters of a State is an insult to their intelligence, for it is intended to deceive them, and a deliberate attempt to deceive, especially so clumsy an attempt as this platform, is a reflection upon the brains of those to whom it is submitted.

This platform proves that the opposition to the Kansas City platform is not opposition to silver, but opposition to every needed reform and opposition to all that the masses desire.

I had expected that a platform prepared by Mr. Hill for Judge Parker would be evasive and lacking in frankness, but I did not conceive that any body of men calling themselves Democrats would present such a platform as a recommendation of a candidate. * * *

Can anyone doubt that with such a platform as was adopted in New York and with a candidate whose conscience would permit him to run upon such a platform—does anyone doubt that with such a platform and candidate the party would be mortgaged beforehand to the corporations that are now using the Government as a private asset and plundering the people at will? * * *

I for one am not willing that the Democratic party shall become the tool of the corporations. I am not willing that it shall be the champion of organized wealth.

ADVICE TO DEMOCRACY.

Let us drive out of the party every Democrat who betrays his trust, every official who would administer the office for his private advantage. Let us make Democracy stand not only for good government, for honest government, but for a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Having been driven to this unfortunate condition, some have seen fit to avenge themselves by maliciously attacking our worthy President, charging him with extravagance and unjust expenditures.

It is to be regretted that you should stultify yourselves by resorting to the use of absurd, malicious, contemptible falsehoods and misrepresentations, manufactured and inspired by yellow journals, and which are without foundation or a word of truth in them.

Indeed, you are entitled to sympathy. With this eruption in your ranks and your distracted condition, confronted with progress, prosperity, and a happy condition of the people, brought about under the seven years of Republican rule, Republican principles, and Republican policies, it is plain to you and to everybody that your defeat is certain next November. This is unfortunate for you, viewing it from a political standpoint; but how fortunate it is for the American people that we have such a clean, fearless, honest, patriotic President.

One who has labored so earnestly, conscientiously, and faithfully to fulfill his burdensome duties, always in thorough sympathy with the best interests of all the people, always pursuing his duty with fidelity, dignity, and rectitude of purpose, dominated by noble and lofty ideals; a statesman, a diplomat, fortified by a wealth of learning; a man whose character, success, record, both private and public, is without a stain of immorality, deception, fraud, or corruption, his loyalty to principles, his devotion to truth, his untiring energy, his lofty ideals and conscientious work, entitle him to the respect and admiration of all.

Such is Theodore Roosevelt, the man whom the Republican party will present as its candidate in the coming election; and, gentlemen, you are wasting ink, time, and energy in circulating such absurd misrepresentations. While I fully appreciate that the charges made will not be taken seriously, however, in view of all that has been printed, I will incorporate in the RECORD some editorials to show what is thought of it by honest and reliable publications. First, one from the Skandinaven, of Chicago, under date of April 15, a paper of thirty-nine years' standing, with a large circulation, not only in the United States, but in other countries, owned and edited by men of the highest standing and integrity, and whose veracity is beyond reproach, a paper first and all the time a champion of honest and clean government, men, and administration of affairs. The Skandinaven says:

THE PRESIDENT AND THE LIARS.

A recent issue of Reform, a prohibition organ published at Eau Claire, Wis., contains an editorial, reading as follows:

"President Roosevelt has spent more of the people's money in two years for the amusement of himself and family than McKinley spent in five years and Grover Cleveland in eight years. Since the days of Grant no President has wasted more in luxuries than has Mr. Roosevelt. He has used nearly a million dollars for furniture and the beautifying of the White House and its gardens. Among other things may be mentioned the Government pleasure yacht Mayflower, which he has caused to be fitted out for his private use. This alone cost $165,000. Among the first things he bought was a set of champagne glasses worth $450 a piece.

"Now he has requested the Congress to appropriate the following amounts for his benefit: $30,000 for the care of his horses, $1,000,000 for a summer residence, $146,000 for servants.

"It is possible that even Republicans will scratch their heads at the extravagance of the President in making the people's money roll."

That these statements are absurd and malicious lies is a matter of common knowledge to everybody who has kept himself or herself informed on current events. They were manufactured to serve personal ends, and have been persistently circulated by a certain class of "yellow" newspapers, which appeal to the most ignorant among us and to the baser instincts of all.

But, however self-evident their absurdity may be, such falsehoods are likely to work mischief when repeated and confirmed by newspapers that pose as respectable organs, although they can not claim to be fair-minded and truthful. There is evidence that the compact chunk of lies published by the Reform has misled some well-meaning people.

Also one from the Outlook, under date of April 9, 1904, a nonpartisan publication:

IS THE PRESIDENT EXTRAVAGANT?

Doctor Jowett, master of Balliol, the eminent translator of Plato and one of the most gentle and delightful men ever produced by Oxford University, once, in a moment of natural resentment at some unjust criticism of some of his administrative acts, laid down this rule for a man of action: "Never retract. Never explain. Get it done, and let them howl."

There are times, however, when explanations or denials are necessary even for men of action—if not by way of justification of certain courses pursued or certain acts performed, at least by way of relieving the honest solicitude of friends who, on hearing definite accusations made and not knowing the facts themselves and receiving no denial from the person accused, are greatly disturbed and troubled.

No man in this country so suffers from false and gossiping stories, and from his inability to make his honest and indignant denials public, as the man who fills the office of President. It is a common idea that Washington, owing to the supreme nobility of his character, to his supreme importance to his country, and to the supreme necessity for national safety of a united and patriotic people during the first Presidency, was spared the personal slanders and attacks which are all too common in political life. The contrary is, however, true. The current newspapers and political literature of Washington's time contain the basest and meanest personal attacks upon him; he was accused of personal moral laxness, of extravagance, of snobbishness, of military ignorance, of political incapacity—in fact, of the whole round of moral and official defects which a base partisan antagonism is constantly seeking for and rejoices when it thinks it discovers them.

Similar attacks are made upon President Roosevelt. A typical one is contained in the following paragraph from the Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn.:

"We want to see a Democrat in the White House again for a number of reasons. He is needed there in the interest of economy. Mr. Roosevelt makes too many demands upon the people's purse to satisfy his vanity, to amuse his children, and to exalt "me." There is probably not a palace in Memphis that cost as much as $50,000. The President wants $100,000 to build a stable for his horses. His private naval review last summer cost the people over $200,000. He appropriated for his own use and that of his family a $500,000 naval yacht, had over $50,000 worth of furnishings put in it, and has also had smaller vessels assigned to the task of nursing the Roosevelt kids at Oyster Bay. The White House has been enlarged at an expense of $500,000, a $2,500 tennis court has been built for his children, and the living expenses have been about triple. We would like to see a Democrat in the White House in order that a period might be put to this carnival of graft and extravagance."

At first glance these charges seem so extravagant in statement and so unchivalrous and un-Southern in spirit as to deserve no attention. They are, however, being circulated through the country so widely by unscrupulous partisans that The Outlook proposes to state the facts—not for the sake of the reputation of Mr. Roosevelt, who is perfectly competent to take care of himself, but for the sake of those citizens who, without access to the facts, are justly disturbed when the President of the United States is openly accused of snobbish extravagance and no denial is made. The facts in the case are as follows:

No appropriation has been made for a new stable at the White House. Without the knowledge of the President, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds reported that, inasmuch as the present stable is on unhealthful ground, and the horses, which are Government property and not the personal property of the President, became sick in it, the Government ought to build a new stable. Whoever is elected President next autumn, decency and good business management call for a new stable.

There was no private naval review last summer, and the review that did take place did not cost the people a penny beyond the usual expenditures for the proper maintenance of the Navy. The review to which the Memphis Appeal refers took place in Long Island Sound in the presence of hundreds of spectators, and was far less private than the ordinary reviews held off the coast. The review was made solely because the officers of the Navy, a body of men of whom every American, whether Democrat or Republican, ought to be proud, felt it would be a good thing to have the President show a personal interest in the fleet.

There is no such thing as a Presidential yacht. Perhaps the Appeal refers to the Mayflower, which is ordinarily used by the Admiral and Secretary of the Navy in the prosecution of their necessary duties. Not a dollar has been spent upon furnishing this vessel for the use of the President or his family. The President has been aboard either the Mayflower or the Sylph not more than ten times during his term of office in the Presidential chair, and those occasions have been times when the President was exercising his natural and necessary duties as Commander-in-Chief of the Navy.

As to entertainments at the White House, the fact is that when the President receives guests at his table at dinner or luncheon he pays the butcher, the baker, and the grocer out of his own pocket. It is true that there is a tennis court on the White House grounds, but it cost less than $400—which is a much smaller amount than was expended upon the greenhouses under previous Administrations. We think there can be no serious objection on the part of any decent American to the President playing tennis with his children, and it is impossible for them to play tennis except on the White House grounds.

Finally the enlargement and improvement of the White House was made not on the recommendation of President Roosevelt, but on the initiative and with the approval of Congress without regard to political party. The White House was unsafe and insanitary, and Congress rightly thought that it was improper and undignified to leave it longer in the condition in which it was before the present renovation. Senator COCKRELL, of Missouri, and Congressman McRae, of Arkansas, both well known and influential Democrats, were among the Senators and Congressmen who took the lead in having the changes made.

There is no question that the American people at large wish that their President, whatever may be his party, shall live in dignity and with appropriate surroundings. The White House is not a private residence. It is open to visits both of Americans and of distinguished officials and travelers from other countries. The Outlook ventures to say that the President and his family accept their temporary home in the White House as one of the burdens, not as one of the advantages, of the Presidential office. No American with any knowledge of the habits of dignified living can object to the reasonable expenditure of money which has made the White House more efficient as the Executive Office of the President, and more appropriate and beautiful as the place in which public receptions and official dinners are given for the benefit not of the President's family, but of the entire American people. As a matter of fact, President Roosevelt, although a Republican by name, is thoroughly democratic in his tastes and manner of life.

The editor of the Memphis Appeal is quite within his reasonable and just rights if he desires to see a Democrat in the White House again; but he is justly open to the criticism of insincerity when he bases his demand for a change of Administration on the ground of a national desire for personal economy in the President's expenditures. The days when Senators and Congressmen and Cabinet officers chewed wooden toothpicks in public and spat tobacco juice with equal facility at every point of the compass have happily gone by. The American people no longer want that kind of simplicity. They want public officials to do their work effectively, with dispatch, and with reasonable expenditure of money, but they want them to live in conditions which make for comfort, health, and dignity.

I believe the American people, irrespective of party, not only desire truth in the matter of public affairs, but also fair play. During this session of Congress I have sat in my seat and listened to all manner of fairy tales from our friends on the other side with regard to criticisms of the Republican party, its policies, and its administration. We expect this from them, especially upon the eve of the national campaign.

The Republican party speaks for itself, and the wisdom of its policies and counsels are attested to-day by the grandest epoch of prosperity the nation has ever known. It is not to defend it that I rise here to-day, but rather to correct reckless perversions of facts with regard to the present occupant of the White House. If anything is needed to show the straits to which the Democratic party is driven for material for the coming campaign, the best example is furnished by these wholesale misrepresentations of facts in regard to White House expenditures.

There are some facts generally known to all of us, especially those of you who have investigated and given this matter thought and attention. You know and I know, as stated in these articles, that the charges made are false and without foundation.

First, as to the new stable for the White House, a matter which has been discussed more or less on the floor of this House: To start with, no recommendation was made by the President for an appropriation for this purpose. Again, the stable is located on unhealthy ground and on ground set aside for memorial purposes, and sooner or later the stables will have to be moved, and the recommendation made by the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds was proper. The President's stable is carried on exactly as it was carried on under President Cleveland, Harrison, and McKinley, and his other predecessors. It is chiefly used for Government horses and carriages. The President's own horses and carriages have been paid for by himself, not by the Government. The President pays for the coachman and for the feed of his horses.

Relative to the Mayflower and the naval review, the facts are exactly as stated in the article in the Outlook, and every patriotic citizen will approve of what was done in this respect.

Next, as to the alleged expenditure for furniture and decorations of the White House: While the plans carried out may not meet the approval of all, whatever work was done was authorized by Congress on its own motion, without any suggestion or recommendation from the President. Democrats and Republicans alike agreed that the work was absolutely necessary. Members on your side were among those who took the lead in the Senate and House in advocating the change. The building had come to such a condition that it was necessary to prop up the floors whenever a reception was held.

The work was done by McKim, Meade & White, architects, and the results of their efforts to restore the White House to what it was originally planned and designed to be in the days of Washington and Jefferson have met with cordial and almost universal approval from architects of this country and all who are interested in the preservation of a great historic landmark. Every competent architect in the country will tell you that it was a genuinely patriotic service thus to restore it to its old simple and stately dignity.

The cost of these improvements, including the erection and furnishing of the new Executive office building, was not much over half the sum stated in the article mentioned, and incidentally the expenditure of this money removed the necessity of a much larger expenditure within a very few years to rebuild the White House. The changes that have been made will stand for a century to come.

In the White House the upper floor is used only for the President's family. The two lower floors, with the exception of the kitchen and dining room, are used for the public, the family of the President never otherwise using these two floors unless in connection with receiving the public. Between 150,000 and 200,000 citizens every year visit the White House and go through these two floors, or are received personally by the President and Mrs. Roosevelt. Almost the entire expense of the rebuilding of the White House was for these two floors used by the public. The only thing done with the rooms on the floor used by the President and his family was to repair them, put in modern plumbing, etc.; in short, to alter them only so as to make them fit for habitation.

All the unusual expense was for the two floors which are used for the public, and which are, except the kitchen and dining room, used by the President and his family only to receive the public. In the same way the expense for the maintenance of the White House is almost entirely for the maintenance and care of these two floors and for the attendants who look after the people who come to see the White House, who average over 500 per day. On the floor where the President and his family live almost all the work is done by those whom the President personally pays.

In the same way the entertaining done by the President is paid for out of his own private purse when he is in the White House, just as when he is at Oyster Bay. The state dinners, where he entertains the Cabinet, Senators, Members of the Lower House, justices of the Supreme Court, and foreign representatives, no less than the smaller dinners and other entertainments, are paid for out of the private purse of the President, he being put to a heavy outlay from his own private purse in order that he may suitably fulfill some of the necessary functions of his position as Chief Magistrate. I dare say that some of the critics who have attacked the President for his expenditure in this way have themselves been recipients of his hospitality and are apparently ignorant that the hospitality which they thus requite was at the President's private expense.

The grounds around the White House are managed as they always have been managed, and at present a little less expensively than under previous Administrations.

The other items mentioned in the Reform, namely, $450 apiece for champagne glasses, $1,000,000 for a summer residence, and $146,000 for servants, are so ridiculous they hardly merit consideration, and, as all other charges, as we all know, they are absolutely without foundation.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I just came in in time to hear the last part of the hysterical speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] in respect to the tobacco bill. I do not know that any reply at length is necessary. I can state to the House the facts in the case. There were introduced at this session of Congress and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means——

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman desires, I will give him the substance of the first part of my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. DALZELL. For what?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. DALZELL. I have only two minutes. As I was saying, there were introduced and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means some six or seven bills relating to the relief of the tobacco growers. They all contemplated a reduction of the revenues.

The subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means had extensive hearings. We heard, I suppose, twenty-five or thirty witnesses, and amongst those witnesses was the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who testified that any relief sought by the bills beyond that embodied in the first section of the bill introduced by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee would eventually reduce the revenues to an extent beyond his computation, and it was his judgment that it would not be wise to have any such legislation at this time.

The subcommittee, however, were anxious to give relief in so far as they could; and if the gentleman will pardon my mentioning him by name, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GAINES, at one of the hearings intimated, I think he said expressly, that if the relief embodied in the first section of his bill could be granted, it would be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

I thereupon had the Commissioner of Internal Revenue prepare a bill in accordance with that suggestion, and I stated to the gentleman that we thought it would be useless to make a report if it was intended to put on the amendments embodied in the other sections of the bill, because in that event it would be impossible to pass the bill, and that I was willing to have the committee report the Commissioner's bill if they were willing to accept it. I understood they were all willing to accept it. I think I deserve thanks instead of criticism from the gentleman from Virginia. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I will simply ask leave to print an article I have recently written for the North American Review on the canteen legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to print an article from the North American Review. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the objection to the request of my friend from Maine, I would like to ask whether he asks to print in the RECORD all the articles he has contributed to the North American Review on the subject of the canteen?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; the gentleman has only contributed one. One-half came out in the March issue and the other half came out in the April issue.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, in connection with that request I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to print a reply to that article.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have not the slightest objection, as far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire in this connection to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and print in the RECORD some observations on the trusts, on the tariff, and on the New York platform.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will not object if the gentleman will allow me to print one in reply to show that Senator John Sherman was not the author of the "Sherman anti-trust law," but that Senator Reagan and other Democrats introduced bills before Mr. Sherman did on the subject—— [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD respecting the irrigation act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention, as a supplement to the very acrimonious attack made by the good-natured gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOUGHERTY] on the Ways and Means Committee, to the fact that the law which he denounced as robbery and all that sort of thing and an injustice and oppression stood on the statute books during the entire four years of the Democratic Administration and was not disturbed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the Republicans did not repeal it when they enacted the Dingley tariff law.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Never mind, now. I did not ask the gentleman to get into my speech. Mr. Chairman, I notify the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that his remarks will not be embodied in mine.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It would be the only valuable portion of the gentleman's speech, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. To that request, Mr. Chairman, I shall object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I do not think the gentleman will object. I do not want to extend it on this topic.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, we have reached a fine condition. Here we have stood this afternoon and allowed some eight or ten Democrats to print speeches in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, we are trying to catch up with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if I am in order, in reply to that I would say that if all the gentlemen published they will not come up to the twenty-seven and one-quarter pages in the RECORD contributed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], wherein he plastered the present incumbent at the White House with union labels for twenty years back.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] know how many columns of this RECORD he has contributed during this Congress? I can tell him.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. "The gentleman from Mississippi" knows that every column he contributed was contributed on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can tell the gentleman how many. Two hundred and eight columns up to one week ago this morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I never measured the columns, but whatever was contributed by "the gentleman from Mississippi" was contributed in his place on this floor.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, the gentleman is evidently mistaken. He contributed column after column of newspaper articles that were never read. The gentleman had better refresh his recollection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, there is not a remark pretending to proceed from "the gentleman from Mississippi" that was not uttered on this floor. Of course there are articles referred to in his speeches and things from books referred to and leave obtained to print them, and they are printed among his remarks, but there is no speech of mine in this RECORD anywhere that was written by anyone else or was not made upon the floor of this House by "the gentleman from Mississippi."

Mr. MANN. That is the very reason we ask leave to extend, because the gentleman has taken up all of the time. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, the gentleman has plenty of time. We will stay here until July if they want us to.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I have stood by and given my consent to leave to print, and now the gentleman objects to the insertion of some documents in the RECORD which I desire to put there.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not object to the gentleman's inserting any documents in the RECORD. The gentleman asked leave to insert his speech in the RECORD.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to insert some documents in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then I shall withdraw my objection to what the gentleman desires if he wants to insert some documents in the RECORD.

Mr. LACEY. I will renew my request, then, Mr. Chairman, to insert some documents in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to know what the speech is about.

Mr. LACEY. One of the documents is the speech of Secretary Shaw upon the enforcement of the trust law by Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I object to that, because it does not state the facts.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman. I object.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That speech perverts history, and that is why I object.

Mr. LACEY. Then I am afraid that objection will condemn my friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] to eternal silence. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I always tell the truth, here and everywhere. I say that Sherman was not the author of the Sherman law; that Mr. Shaw contends he was. That is what I say. He never wrote a line of it, and I do not intend that that speech of Mr. Shaw shall go in the RECORD. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that on both sides of the Chamber an effort has been made to accommodate various gentlemen who desire leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD, and thereby the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK], a member of the committee, has been deprived from making an explanation of some features of the bill, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes in a discussion of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how that can be done when that same right was denied me? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said that it could not be done.

Mr. HAMILTON. The time has been consumed on both sides inadvertently.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for discussion and amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LLOYD. I hope that no one will object to the proposition which has been made to hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK]. This is an important bill, and no one on the floor of this House has investigated its provisions more thoroughly than that gentleman. I hope he will be permitted to occupy ten minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. I suggest that the reading of the bill begin, and then the gentleman from Indiana may have his opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States from the Territory of Alaska shall be chosen by the people thereof, who shall be a citizen of the United States, and who shall discharge like duties and be entitled to the same rights, privileges, and emoluments as are discharged, exercised, and enjoyed by Delegates from the several Territories of the United States in the House of Representatives: Provided, however, That such Delegate, in lieu of all other allowances, shall, in addition to his salary, receive the sum of $1,500 per annum, which shall cover all mileage and other expenses, except stationery allowance and compensation for clerk hire.

SEC. 2. SEC. 3. That the first election of such Delegate shall be held on the second Tuesday of September in the year 1904, and the second election for Delegate shall be held on the second Tuesday of September, 1906; and thereafter such elections shall be held on the second Tuesday of September in each year when Members of the House of Representatives are chosen.

SEC. 4. That no person shall be a Delegate who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected be a bona fide resident, and an elector as prescribed in this act, of the Territory of Alaska.

SEC. 5. That in order to be qualified to vote for said Delegate to Congress a person shall—

First. Be a male citizen of the United States and have resided in Alaska not less than one year immediately preceding the election at which he offers to vote.

Second. Have attained the age of 21 years.

Third. Be able to speak, read, and write the English or some other European language.

SEC. 6. That each incorporated town now existing or hereafter organized in the Territory of Alaska shall, for the purposes of this act, constitute one election precinct; and the common council of each incorporated town, at least thirty days prior to the date of the holding of each election under this act, shall select and provide a polling place in said town, and shall give notice of said approaching election by posting a copy of said notice in at least three conspicuous public places in said town, and wherever there are one or more newspapers of general circulation published in said town, then a copy of said notice shall also be published in one or more of such newspapers at least thirty days prior to the date of the election, and said notice among other things shall specify the date of said election, the location of said polling place, and the hours between which said polling place will be open; and not less than ten days before the date of such election said common council shall appoint from among the qualified electors of said precinct three judges of election for that said precinct, no more than two of whom shall be of the same political party.

SEC. 7. That all of the territory in each commissioner's precinct which now exists, or which may hereafter be created, in Alaska, lying outside of an incorporated town, shall, for the purposes of this act, constitute one election district; that in each year in which a Delegate is to be elected the commissioner in each election district shall issue a joint order and notice signed by him and entered in his records in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, in which said joint order and notice he shall—

First. Divide his election district into such number of voting precincts as may in his judgment be necessary or convenient, defining the boundaries of each precinct by natural objects and permanent monuments or landmarks, as far as practicable, and in such manner that the boundaries of each can be readily determined and become generally known from such description, specify a polling place in each of said precincts, and give to each precinct a name or number by which the same shall be designated; and Second. Give notice of said approaching election, specifying in said notice, among other things, the date of such election, the boundaries of said precincts as established, the location of the polling place in each precinct, and the hours between which said polling places will be open.

Said joint order and notice shall be given publicity by said commission by posting copies of the same at least thirty days before the date of each election of Delegate. Said copies shall be posted as follows: One at the office of the commissioner in said district, and three copies to be posted in three conspicuous public places in each of said voting precincts as established, one of which shall be placed at the designated polling place in each precinct.

Prior to the date of the holding of such election said commissioner shall select, notify, and appoint from among the qualified electors in said precincts three judges of election for each of said precincts, no more than two of whom shall be of the same political party. Said commissioner shall notify all of said judges of election of their appointment as such so that each and all of them shall receive said notice at least ten days before the date of the election.

SEC. 8. That the three judges of election in each precinct shall constitute and shall be known and designated as the election board for said precinct. That the election board in each precinct, or a majority of them, shall have authority, and it shall be their duty, to provide a suitable ballot box and prepare the polling place for the holding of said election.

That the members of said election board in each precinct, before entering upon the duties of their office, shall each be severally sworn, before an officer qualified to administer oaths, to honestly and faithfully perform the duties of their positions; and if no such officer be present or available, then any one of said duly appointed or selected judges of election may administer the necessary oath to said other two judges, and he shall afterwards in turn be sworn by one of them.

That each of said judges shall have authority to administer any oath to the voter necessary or proper under this act, and said judges shall have equal authority; and in case of any question or disagreement over any matter during the course of said election the decision of the majority of said judges shall govern.

Two of the three judges of election in each precinct shall perform the duties of clerks of election for that said precinct, the two judges performing the duties of clerks to be of different political parties, and it shall be the duty of each of them to keep a correct duplicate register and to enter therein the names of the voters in alphabetical order and the fact that they have voted, or have offered to vote and were refused, and a brief statement of the reason of refusal.

SEC. 9. That each of the candidates for the office of Delegate herein provided for, at any election held hereunder, shall be entitled to one watcher at each voting precinct, who shall be permitted to be present within the place of voting at such precinct, and in some place therein where he may at all times be in full view of every act done. Such watcher shall have the right to be so present at all times from the opening of the polls until the ballots are finally counted and the result certified by the election board. Each watcher shall be required to present to the election board proper credentials signed by the candidate he represents, showing him to be the duly authorized watcher for such person.

SEC. 10. That in case any of the judges of election selected as herein provided for any precinct shall fail to appear and qualify at the time and place designated for the election for which they shall be appointed, the qualified voters present may, by a majority viva voce vote, select a suitable person or persons to fill the vacancy or vacancies on such election board; and any person or persons so selected shall qualify and serve on said election board, with the same powers and in the same manner as if he had been appointed as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 11. That any person offering to vote may be challenged by any election officer, or any other person entitled to vote at the same polling place, and when so challenged before being allowed to vote he shall make and subscribe to the following oath: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that you are 21 years of age and a citizen of the United States, and that you have resided in the Territory of Alaska for one year immediately preceding said election day; that you are able to speak, read, and write the English or some other European language; that you have not voted at this election," and further naming the place from which the voter came immediately prior to living in the precinct in which he offers to vote, and giving the length of time of his residence in the former place. And upon the voter swearing to such an affidavit he shall be allowed to vote; but if any person so challenged shall refuse or fail to take such oath, then his vote shall be rejected; and any person swearing falsely in any such affidavit shall be guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer punishment as is prescribed by law for persons guilty of perjury.

SEC. 12. That the election boards herein provided for shall keep the several polling places open for the reception of votes from 8 o'clock a. m. to 6 o'clock p. m. on the day of election.

The voting at said election shall be by secret printed or written ballot, substantially in the following form: "For Delegate from Alaska, (here insert name of person voted for.)"

Such ballot shall be folded by the voter so as not to disclose the vote, and by him handed to one of the judges of election, who shall immediately, in the presence of all the members of the election board, deposit the same, folded as aforesaid, in the ballot box, where the same shall remain untouched until the polls are closed. At the time the ballot is so deposited the two judges of election performing the duties of clerks shall each of them enter in his duplicate register the name of the voter in alphabetical order and the fact that he has voted.

SEC. 13. That the election boards herein provided at each polling place as soon as the polls are closed shall immediately publicly proceed to open the ballot box and count and canvass the votes cast, make duplicate certificates of the result thereof, duly signed by all the members of said election board, and they shall then immediately transmit one of said duplicate certificates, together with one of the duplicate registers containing the names of the voters and the ballots cast, all securely sealed, to the clerk of the court for the division within which such precinct is situated. The other duplicate certificate and duplicate register of voters they shall at once transmit, securely sealed, to the governor of Alaska at his place of residence.

The clerk of the court in each of the divisions of Alaska shall compile the returns received from the various polling places, ascertain the result, transmit such compilation and result, duly authenticated, to the governor of Alaska at his place of residence. Said clerks shall retain the duplicate certificates, together with the registers containing the names of the voters and the ballots received from the various polling precincts, for a period of six months after each election, and in case notice shall be served upon them, or either of them, of a contest arising out of said election, said duplicate certificates, registers, and ballots shall be further retained by said clerk or clerks to await the order of the tribunal having the final determination of such contest; otherwise such duplicate certificates, registers, and ballots shall be destroyed at the expiration of six months from the reception thereof.

SEC. 14. That the respective clerks of the court shall make return, as hereinbefore provided, to the governor so that he shall receive the same not later than the third Tuesday of October next succeeding the election.

SEC. 15. That the governor, the secretary of the Territory of Alaska, and the collector of customs for Alaska shall constitute a canvassing board for the Territory of Alaska to canvass and compile in writing the vote specified in the certificates of election returned to the governor from all the several election precincts as aforesaid.

The said canvassing board shall perform its duties at the office of the governor within ten days after the third Tuesday of October in each year in which an election is held under and by virtue of this act, and shall continue with such work from day to day until the same is completed.

In case it shall appear to said board that no election return as hereinbefore prescribed has been received by the governor from any precinct in which an election has been held, the said board may accept in place thereof the certificate of election for such precinct received from the clerk of the court, and may canvass and compile the same with the other election returns.

Said board upon the completion of said canvass shall declare the person who has received the greatest number of votes for Delegate to be the duly elected Delegate from Alaska, and shall issue and deliver to him in writing under their hands and seals a certificate of his election.

SEC. 16. That any person who, by any means, shall hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct any other person from qualifying himself to vote or from lawfully voting at any election herein provided for, or who shall knowingly personate and vote, or attempt to vote, in the name of any other person, or who shall vote more than once at the same election, or shall vote at a place where or at a time when he may not lawfully be entitled to vote, or shall do any unlawful act to secure an opportunity to vote, for himself or for any other person, or who, by or through any force, threat, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer thereof, unlawfully votes himself, or procures another to vote, or prevents or induces another to refrain from exercising his right of suffrage, or induces by any such means any officer of an election to do any unlawful act or omit to do his duty in any manner, or who directly or indirectly, in any manner, shall fraudulently change or cause to be changed the returns or the true and lawful results of any election hereunder, or shall attempt to do the same, or who shall delay, cause to be delayed, or connive at the delay of election returns in any manner or attempt to do so, shall be guilty of a crime, and upon the conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 nor less than $100 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both, and pay the costs of the prosecution; and it is further provided that every officer of any election held hereunder who neglects to perform or violates any duty imposed upon him as such officer, or knowingly does any unauthorized act with the intent to affect the election or the result thereof, or who shall permit, make, or connive at any false count or certificate of election, or who shall conceal, withhold, destroy, or willfully delay the returns of election, or connive at the same being done, or who shall aid, counsel, or procure any person to do or attempt to do any act made a crime hereinbefore, or shall attempt to do any of the acts hereinbefore mentioned, shall be guilty of a crime, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or by both, and shall pay all costs of the prosecution; and jurisdiction of all such matters is hereby conferred upon the district courts of Alaska.

SEC. 17. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the district court of Alaska to hear and determine all controversies, legal and equitable, that may arise out of any election held under the provisions of this act, regulated by the general pleading and practice of said court.

SEC. 18. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. HAMILTON (before the reading of the bill was concluded). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill. I think it is fully understood on both sides of the House.

There being no objection, the further reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. HAMILTON. I now ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK] may be permitted to proceed for such time as he may desire.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in this bill for at least four years. And for four years I have been working at each session of Congress that Alaska may have Delegate representation at the capital city of the country it belongs to.

I have done this not because I have any personal relations in that far-off land, but for the reason that of all the territory included in or belonging to the United States, Alaska needs and deserves representation more than any other.

The people there need it even more than most of the States.

Alaska is far beyond the farthest frontier, unknown and hardly appreciated by most of us who have not visited that wonderful land.

I think I speak within bounds when I say that very few have ever taken the time to look into the conditions, requirements, and exigencies of that country, whose prospects, resources, and commercial and political importance have hardly been dreamed of by the casual observer of time and events.

Even now, in the flood tide of Alaska's marvelous development and unexampled progress, many view it as a land of rocky fastnesses and eternal snows, with a sunless past and a dreary future. There are some who do not give it even the poor compliment of a passing thought.

This is not the first time in the history of the world that a father has failed to appreciate the merts of his best child.

Why, Mr. Chairman, away off yonder in the northland toil and struggle in splendid loyal manhood the best blood of all the States, uncared for, half protected, and all but forgotten by the people in the States, living in ease and luxury, enjoying every right and favor a rich and generous government can bestow.

Here is a country hardly thought of, which holds within its air and soil the elements of a mighty empire that shall add to the strength and perpetuity of the Republic, infinitely neglected.

Its resources surpass belief, with its mines of gold, silver, copper, and coal; its illimitable forests of merchantable timber, its inexhaustible wealth of fur-bearing animals, its untold value in the fishery of seal, whale, salmon, cod, and halibut; and then, along with all that, its supreme commercial and political vantage ground among the nations of the earth. All this reminds us that our watchful care in the future should make amends for the neglect of the past.

We have owned that country for more than thirty-four years. Other Territories have been a continual expense. Alaska has been profit both directly and indirectly—profit in the Government coffers and money in the pockets of the people.

During that thirty-four years—from 1869 to 1903—the balance in the Treasury of the United States, over and above all receipts and expenditures, stands more than $999,000 to Alaska's credit—profit to the General Government.

The profits to our people in seal skins amount to the enormous sum of $52,000,000. Then add to that the salmon industry of $50,000,000; gold mined, $31,000,000; our trade with Alaska at $25,000,000, and we have in thirty-four years the magnificent figures of $158,999,000, an average profit perennially of $4,676,000 to the people of America.

Will some one name any other insular possession that can or will do anything like this for us? And the future is filled with promise that multiply these figures many times repeated.

For twelve long years these waiting men and women have asked for a Delegate. For twelve long years their request has been refused for one cause and another.

It is the unanimous opinion of your committee that the time has arrived at this session when, in justness and fairness to ourselves, as well as to them, they should have representation in this body no longer delayed.

And that representative should be a man living in Alaska, selected by the people there, one of them, responsible to the people themselves, conversant with all their needs and requirements, and in sympathy with all their hopes and desires.

Some of you may rise with fears. Some one may say it is a doubtful experiment and an unnecessary expense, when, in truth and fact, this privilege—did I say privilege?—yes, more than that, this paramount right—is an absolute necessity to a great and growing people.

We give them nothing but the remuneration of the Delegate. They pay all election expenses.

Do they need a Delegate? Why, Mr. Chairman, they need it far more than your people or mine. Its isolation, peculiar surroundings, distance, climate, soil, business, commercial conditions and development, its population and their environments—all these make it impossible for Congress to understand their wants.

They need representation, and they ought to have it upon and under the principles of a republican form of government.

It has been suggested that the President be empowered to appoint a Delegate for them and avoid the expense and inconvenience of an election.

Mr. Chairman, Alaska has over 30,000 brave and strong men, who have gone there from every State in the Union, the most manly, virile, hardy people in the world.

They say to us: "We want one of our number to represent us at Washington. We want to select him, and we want him to know us and be responsible to us directly."

They say to us: "We know an election means inconvenience and some expense, but we ask that privilege. It might be an inconvenience that would seem great to you living in ease and luxury. To us it is but the simple and usual incident of our lives in this country."

Tenacity of purpose and power of endurance are the vital qualities that moved them there. They have been willing to forego the pleasant opportunities of our life to develop a great country. The best blood of any nation flows in the veins of its pioneers. There is that something about the pioneer, the new settler, the innovator, the pathfinder, whose life represents days of self-sacrificing toil and sometimes of martyrdom, a heroism everywhere unequaled and unparalleled, that shall always challenge my admiration, invoke my reverence, and enlist my services.

They live in cabins that our children may dwell in mansions.

They rear in the gray dawn of the wild primeval strength of nature a new and mighty empire, all for the glory of our common country, that it may wax strong and grow great for our children's sake, and our children's children to infinity.

Don't tell me that an election is impracticable in that far-off vast country.

Nothing is impracticable to these brave men, to the builders of empires, to the spirit that knows no frontiers of enterprise, to the self-forgetting reliant manhood which bears all burdens that his heroic life may be rounded out to posterity.

The best men that have ever lived, the salt of the earth, are the torchbearers of American endeavor. They began at Plymouth Rock. They braved everything; they stood up erect against the wrecks of the ragged rocks of New England's coast, beasts and tomahawks, hostile hosts and winter's blast—and when their bleeding feet failed them, their limbs trembled, and their hearts ached in the longing memories of home and friends beyond the sea, they still walked upon their courage.

They founded the only true Republic that ever existed. With the same old spirit their children moved westward to renew the nation's lifeblood, to live and love and suffer.

They gave to us Sam Houston, Davy Crockett, Lewis and Clark, La Salle, Marquette, Abraham Lincoln, and to-day every one of us can stand up and say, through their sacrifices, with a prouder boast than did the old Roman, "I thank God that I, too, am an American citizen."

They were the type and flower of virgin and robust domain. And now come their sons and daughters, with the bold frontier voice of the Northwest ringing in our ears, the same old spirit in their hearts, the blood of the forefathers in their veins, to solve another problem in illustrious achievement.

What a splendid story it is. It stirs the soul like martial music. It is the epic poem of the world's liberty, beginning at Plymouth Rock, ending with these brave souls at the Arctic Circle, until to-day the American flag encircles the globe and the American idea encompasses the earth. They have done all this for us. Don't tell me that anything is impracticable to such as these. It is to their blood that we must look for the continuing glory of the race and the perpetuity of the Republic.

Over 30,000 of these heroic men are dwelling yonder in the snow and turmoil of a strange new country, rich and prolific beyond your wildest fancy. And their voice for twelve long years, unheeded, comes down to us. It is the voice of the best, manliest men we have.

And they say to us, "Give us the protection of an interested and sympathetic Government and we will not only support ourselves, but we will annually multiply our country's material wealth many times over."

They say to us, "We have great interests at stake. You have great interests to look after. We want a man at Washington who is one of us, who knows us, our country, our business, and the genius of our soil and sky. We want a man to represent Alaska who is a part of us, selected of our people and by our people. We may be rough and daring and strong, but we are self-governing, and no blot shall ever tarnish the escutcheon of American honor at our hands."

Mr. Chairman, they are doing the yeoman work of the Republic. Let us give them a voice in the affairs of men.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAMILTON. There is no last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have been alluded to in this tobacco discussion in a way that is not altogether satisfactory, and I want to make a statement.

Mr. HAMILTON. I suggest that the gentleman will be precluded from proceeding with anything of that sort.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. HAMILTON. I am ready to move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to make a statement inside of five minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I shall object, unless I shall have an opportunity——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is in order. He has the right to move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I simply want to make a little statement here for myself, because I have been referred to in this tobacco matter this afternoon in a way that calls for a reply, and I would say to the gentleman from Iowa that if he wants to make a speech of four hours I will listen to him.

Mr. LACEY. We do not have the four hours, and the gentleman has not got five minutes, either, as he will have to talk about the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If I can not talk about the tobacco matter I do not want to talk at all. I want to make this statement: The several tobacco bills as they were written interfered with the revenues. The first section of my bill and several others did not interfere with the revenues. After my people—some of whom came before the committee February 4 last—found out at that hearing that the second section, relating to hand stemming and hand twisting, interfered with the revenues, they petitioned me on February 22 last insisting upon getting free leaf tobacco. Since that did not interfere with the revenues they thought this Congress, this session, would grant at least that much relief.

Here is the petition which was sent to the Committee on Ways and Means and printed in the hearings on page 63. After that, at the request of Mr. DALZELL, Mr. Yerkes wrote a bill relieving leaf tobacco entirely of any tax, relieving the farmer or grower of a miserable obligation to "deliver" in person and not by agents his tobacco, whether he is blind, deaf, or dumb, or without arms or limbs. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] then said to us all, "If you will agree to this bill as written, I will report it."

Of course, gentlemen, that meant it was that bill or nothing. My people wanted to get some relief. This relief was fundamental. The farmers in Tennessee and Kentucky say that such a law will greatly relieve them. So we agreed, as we could get nothing more, that we would accept that bill, and we have been trying to get that made law.

It was reported to the full committee by the subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was chairman; it was then reported by the Ways and Means Committee, of which Mr. PAYNE is chairman. Both reports were unanimous. It then passed the House without a dissenting vote, and it is now in the bottom of a subcommittee of the Republican Senate, and I think it will sleep there, I am sorry to say, I am distressed to say, because that means continued bankruptcy and ruin not only to the white people who grow dark tobacco, but to the negroes who are tenants. The proof shows the sheriff is at their doors now, and they are being turned out of their houses, both the whites and the blacks.

The Regie contract people, a foreign concern whose agent has come from Europe to buy, and, united with the American tobacco trust, divided up the tobacco districts, are simply crushing the life out of the dark-tobacco growers of our country. This little measure may give back some liberty to these farmers, in some measure at least. They say it will. I believe it will. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly sorry my young friend from Virginia should have lost patience in this matter. I have lost a little myself, but I am here, and I can not help myself.

I will say the subcommittee gave us a considerate, full hearing twice—on February 4 and 22 last. They were slow about reporting the bill, but we finally got it out of the committee, and finally got it up after it had been reported to the House for ten or twelve days, and passed it in the House. It is not what we wanted, but we agreed to stand by that bill, and I stand here to-day to defend that bill, because I gave my word I would stand by it. It was the best we could do; it was all we could do.

It would give some relief; it would help the people who grow tobacco all over the United States, and I feel indignant that the Senate has not and will not this session pass that little bill which interferes with no revenue whatever, absolutely none, but will give back to the farmer the liberty that God Almighty gave him when he was brought on earth. If I were in the Senate, Mr. Chairman, I would hold up everything in the Senate, everything outside the Senate, and everything that ever was in the Senate if needs be but that I would get that bill passed before this session ends. [Applause.]

Now, I say, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and that whole committee were considerate about giving hearings. We passed the bill here, and I thank you Republicans, every one of you, and I thank the Democrats over here who did not like the bill, but who submitted to its passage because they thought the bill was good as far as it went.

We have talked and worked for the tobacco growers since last November, with the result, gentlemen, that we will go home without any relief given to a patriotic and industrious constituency, the victims of the tobacco trust—the Regie aliens, the allies of the American imperial tobacco trust, all of whom are sheltered by this law, which is bleeding the life blood from a defenseless and outraged people, whose fathers fought for and died to frame our Republic that it might protect their homes and children's firesides from the rapacious aliens that now would destroy them.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PERKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13356, the Alaska Delegate bill, and had instructed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICE, SUPREME COURT, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1953) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico," with a Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS, LEWISBURG, W. VA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 14944) establishing a regular term of the United States circuit and district courts at Lewisburg, W. Va., with a Senate amendment; which was read.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report and resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the superintendent of the Capitol building and grounds shall, under the direction of the Speaker of the House, make such alterations of the rooms now used as a restaurant as to provide facilities for luncheon rooms for the Members, Delegates, and officers of the House, and for the employees of the House and the public. And the privilege of conducting said luncheon rooms shall be granted by the Speaker of the House to such person or persons as he shall select, who shall be subject to removal by him and who shall be governed by such rules for the conduct of said luncheon rooms as he may prescribe: Provided, That in no sense shall it be understood that the practical management of the House luncheon rooms is hereby assumed by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the report which accompanies the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives April 2, 1904, viz:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be, and is hereby, authorized to make inquiry and report the result thereof to the House at the earliest practicable date, as to the desirability and feasibility of conducting the restaurant of the House of Representatives by other business methods than those now in vogue."

Pursuant to this resolution the Committee on Accounts has made careful inquiry into the methods of conducting the House restaurant, has considered statements of its manager, suggestions made by Members of the House, and various propositions having for their object a more satisfactory plan than the present one of conducting the restaurant; and as a result of its inquiry into and consideration of the subject, which more or less affects the comfort and convenience and health of the Members of the House, your committee unanimously recommend the adoption of the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the superintendent of the capitol building and grounds shall, under the direction of the Speaker of the House, make such alterations of the rooms now used as a restaurant as to provide facilities for luncheon rooms for the Members, Delegates, and officers of the House, and for the employees of the House and the public. And the privilege of conducting said luncheon rooms shall be granted by the Speaker of the House to such person or persons as he shall select, who shall be subje t to removal by him, and who shall be governed by such rules for the conduct of said luncheon rooms as he may prescribe: Provided, That in no sense shall it be understood that the practical management of the House luncheon rooms is hereby assumed by the House."

For some time past, or during the present Congress, at least, it has been manifest that the House restaurant has not been conducted satisfactorily either to its patrons or its manager. The restaurant or luncheon rooms, being primarily for the convenience of Members and employees of the House, should be conducted to their satisfaction as nearly as may be possible, without reference to the other patrons, and at the same time be profitable to its manager.

This we find to be impossible by the method in vogue, because the losses sustained on account of perishable food and on account of wages paid to cooks and waiters on dull as well as busy days renders it impracticable to conduct the business with the success that encourages proper maintenance and the application of modern business methods. The manager of the restaurant claims to have lost during the present Congress about $3,000, and we have reason to believe that he has suffered some loss. Therefore marked deterioration in service and quality of food resulted, and has been even more noticeable with the decline in patronage during the present Congress.

But by the elimination of the elaborate bill of fare and by the adoption of the simpler plan of luncheon rooms such as are found in the business centers of our large cities our inquiry leads us to believe that if the rooms now used by the House restaurant are altered, as contemplated by the accompanying resolution, to make them conform to the requirements of modern luncheon rooms, the Members of the House would find the change fully in accordance with their desires and real necessities, and at the same time that the manager, relieved of losses on account of perishable food and unproductive labor, would undoubtedly be able to conduct the business profitably.

One proposition submitted to and considered by your committee was to create the position of manager of the House restaurant at a salary to be paid by the House, and also that the restaurant be conducted by the House, expenditures in excess of income derived from sales to be paid from the contingent fund of the House; but your committee is unanimously and most emphatically opposed to the House engaging in the restaurant business. And we further believe that if the luncheon rooms, such as we have suggested, can not be run with any greater degree of satisfaction to the House than at present or with profit to their manager, their doors would be better closed altogether.

In conclusion, your committee desire to state that the changes contemplated in the resolution reported herewith will not be of a radical nature, the rooms now being used requiring only slight changes to convert them into luncheon rooms of the kind desired, and this the superintendent of the Capitol building and grounds, who has been consulted by your committee, will do.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

JACOB BADER.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 134.

Resolved, etc., That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $202.50 to Jacob Bader, for services rendered as page of the House of Representatives of the United States from February 8, 1902, to April 30, 1902.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after "Representatives."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

That the Senate agrees to recede from its amendment No. 4, with a substitute as follows: Add in lieu of said Senate amendment the following proviso after the word "acres," in line 2, page 4: "Provided, That any former homestead entryman who shall be entitled to an additional entry under section two of this act shall have for ninety days after the passage of this act the preferential right to make additional entry as provided in said section."

F. W. MONDELL.
JOHN LIND.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMER BEAUMONT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, with an amendment of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 4570) to provide an American register for the steamer Beaumont.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 8, after "salvage," insert "less the amount expended in payment of wages to foreign workingmen and in the employment of foreign tugs and for foreign material."

Mr. FORDNEY. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. WILSON of New York obtained leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

TIMBER LANDS IN LIEU OF FOREST-RESERVE LANDS.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 14622) prohibiting the selection of timber lands in lieu of lands in forest reserves.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act no public lands of the United States chiefly valuable for the timber they contain shall be subject to location or selection under the provisions of the acts approved June 4, 1897, June 6, 1900, and March 3, 1901, providing for the location, selection, and patenting of lands in lieu of tracts covered by an unperfected bona fide claim or patent within a forest reserve, and any location or selection hereafter made or sought to be made on lands chiefly valuable for the timber they contain, in lieu of lands within a forest reserve, shall be void and of no effect: Provided, That owners of lands within forest reserves which contain valuable timber may, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, exchange such lands for other unreserved timber lands: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall in any manner affect the provisions of the agreement heretofore entered into by the Secretary of the Interior for the exchange of lands within the San Francisco Mountain Forest Reserve.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire the purpose of this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill provides that in future exchanges of lands in lieu of lands within forest reserves shall be practically exchanges for lands of like character. It prohibits the exchange of nontimbered lands within forest reserves for timbered lands outside. It provides also that where lands within forest reserves are timbered they may be exchanged for like lands outside the reserve.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What provision is made with reference to settlers on forest reserves who have ceded their lands to the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. This bill makes no change in the present law except that it prohibits the exchange of lands practically valueless for timbered lands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not that violate the contract entered into between the Government and citizens living on reserved lands who ceded their lands to the United States?

Mr. MONDELL. No; because an amendment which I propose to offer, if the bill should be considered, will leave all those who have relinquished their lands in the same position they were in when they made the relinquishment. In that way it will not affect them at all.

No relinquishments have been made except with the view of making new selections, but there are some cases where the settler who has made the relinquishment has not up to this time made his selection. The amendment which I propose will leave him in the same condition he was in when he made the relinquishment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does it reserve any land that he would have been entitled to at the time he made the relinquishment?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it gives him the same right that he had when the relinquishment was made.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Provided he shall not take it in timbered land?

Mr. MONDELL. Those who have made relinquishment to the Government will not be affected at all by the bill with the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. With the amendment stated by the gentleman, I should have no objection to the bill; but I prefer to hear the amendment read in order that we may see what its effect will be.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 7, after the words "forest reserve," insert:

"Provided further, That nothing in this act shall affect or restrict the right to make selections in lieu of lands within forest reservations, the title to which was surrendered to the Government prior to April 1, 1904, and that where any forest-reserve lieu selection was filed prior to January 1, 1904, and the base therefor is found invalid for any reason not the fault of the person making such selection, the claimant or purchaser of the selected lieu land shall have the right to perfect his title to the same by the substitution of other forest-reserve lands as a base therefor the same as though this act had not passed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. If I correctly understand this, if a homesteader who relinquished his land within a forest reservation some years ago at a time when he might have had the right to take other lands, and waived it, this allows him to avail himself of the privilege of taking it under this law?

Mr. MONDELL. There is no condition authorizing any relinquishment unless they intend immediately thereafter to make the selection. There have been unquestionably a few relinquishments in the last month or two with a view of making selections where it has not been possible to perfect the selections, and we simply give them that privilege now.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is not the effect of this provision simply this, that it will enable people to go and take Government lands and sell the timber to speculators?

Mr. MONDELL. The object of the bill is to prevent the valuable timber lands getting into the hands of individuals to be exchanged for other valueless lands found within forest reservations.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is does not give them that right.

Mr. MONDELL. It does not give them the right to take that. Without this bill they would not have the right to accept any other lands.

Mr. LIND. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is the amendment that he and I discussed?

Mr. MONDELL. It is the amendment which has just been reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

LEWES, DEL., A SUBPORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5169) making Lewes, Del., a subport of entry.

Be it enacted, etc., That Lewes, in the State of Delaware, be, and is hereby, constituted a subport of entry in the customs collection district of Delaware.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MCGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. —) amending section 8 of an act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, approved April 21, 1904.

Resolved, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes," approved April 21, 1904, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

Add at the end of section 8 of said act the following:

"Townships 22 north, of ranges 1 and 2 east of the Indian meridian, all in the Otoe and Missouria Indian Reservation, which also shall be attached to and become a part of Noble County."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire the object and purpose of the joint resolution. I would like to ask the gentleman what committee reported the resolution?

Mr. MCGUIRE. It has not been referred to any committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say this: It was represented to the Chair that there was an error in the Indian appropriation bill. It has passed both the House and the Senate and has been signed by the President. It is alleged that this is to cure the error. The Chair has no other knowledge.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object. The bill has not been referred to any committee.

The SPEAKER. To what committee does the gentleman want the joint resolution referred?

Mr. MCGUIRE. To the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman from New York will make a motion to adjourn.

REPORT OF ANTHRACITE COAL COMMISSION.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. R. 70) to provide for the printing of the report of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 10,000 copies, in cloth binding, of the report of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners, including the testimony taken by and the arguments made before said commission, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution by the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. HARDWICK. I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (continuing). I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he is going to make a motion to adjourn after this?

Mr. PAYNE. If any gentleman demands the regular order, I suppose I would have to make that motion.

SPECIAL REPORT ON THE DISEASES OF CATTLE.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution No. 150.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 150) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the special report on the Diseases of Cattle.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed and bound in cloth 50,000 copies of the special report on the Diseases of Cattle, with accompanying illustrations, the same to be first revised and brought to date under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, 30,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 15,000 for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 67) providing for the printing of Senate Document No. 240, relating to the beet-sugar industry in the United States.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 110,000 copies of Senate Document No. 240, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, being a special report on the beet-sugar industry in the United States, 20,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 30,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 60,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

In line 7 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask a question—a very pertinent question in the consideration of this bill at this time. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he proposes to adjourn after this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York has not the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. I would say to the gentleman from Mississippi that it is in his power at any time to force adjournment by calling for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will move to adjourn after this, I will let this go through without calling for the regular order, as far as I am concerned; if not, I will call for it.

Mr. PAYNE. All right; let this go through; then if the gentleman calls for the regular order, unless there is something to consider, we will have to adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If I am to be bound, I will object right now. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I hope the gentleman will not object to this.

Mr. PAYNE. I would say if you will let this go through, I will call for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to this.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire as to the necessity of printing 110,000 copies of the report on beet sugar?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say the necessity has been urged upon the committee by the Agricultural Department. They state that they have already on hand 25,000 requests for this publication from people who are interested in the cultivation of beet sugar.

Mr. TAWNEY. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will not object to this.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is 110,000 copies of a report which is devoted to three or four States in the United States. and it seems to be an extraordinary large amount when those of us who represent other States can not get anything printed that our constituents want.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. What do you want printed that you have not got?

Mr. MANN. There are a great many documents we can not get printed.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I have not noticed anything you have brought before the committee which you wished.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would ask the gentleman if this is not the Saylor report, which covers the development of the beet-sugar industry during the past four or five years?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It is.

A MEMBER. What would it cost?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Five thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. MANN. I will not object, but it seems to me a grave discrimination in favor of just a few States of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will now demand the regular order.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I asked unanimous consent a while ago to print some documents in the RECORD, and objection was made. In the meantime I understand the gentleman desires to withdraw the objection.

Mr. LIND. Is that the speech of Secretary Shaw?

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. LIND. Then I feel constrained to object.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, let me make a statement, please.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman did not object to my speaking on the tobacco question a few moments ago, so I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw for a moment my request, as the gentleman from Kentucky in the aisle desires a few moments.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement which I feel is due to the chairman of the subcommittee——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to make a statement—how long?

Mr. STANLEY. For two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel it is due to the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. DALZELL] to make a statement with reference to his position in regard to this tobacco bill. I am sure that my friend from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] did not mean to do him injustice, yet I feel that it is but due to him to say that the conditions under which that bill was reported to the House were conditions that under the circumstances were acquiesced in without any undue exercise of authority on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

He told us fairly and squarely that he could give us half a loaf, but that he could not give us any bread if we did not take the half loaf. We were left to our choice. That choice we took. I feel we should have had the whole loaf, and I am willing to make all the capital I can out of our failure to get it. It is, in my opinion, hardly fair to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to take the half loaf and after receiving it to abuse him personally.

The party in power may be—in my opinion is—entirely responsible for the failure to the tobacco growers in securing this much-needed relief.

It is only just to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that he was in no way discourteous or unfair to the gentlemen before the committee.

In the hearings and in presenting this bill he at no time was peremptory or dictatorial, and in my humble opinion was actuated by a sincere desire to help us so far as the policy of his party would permit. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Territories:

A bill (H. R. 11122) to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 13356) providing for the election of a Delegate from the Territory of Alaska to the House of Representatives of the United States, and defining the qualifications of electors in said Territory.

The bill (H. R. 1925) providing for the removal of the port of entry in the customs-collection district in Alaska from Sitka, Alaska, to Juneau, Alaska, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 11582) authorizing the issuance of letters rogatory by the Commissioner of Patents and providing for the execution of letters rogatory issued from foreign patent offices was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The bill (H. R. 15128) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cancel a certain bond of Klaw & Erlanger was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 150) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report on Diseases of Cattle was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF THE BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 67) providing for the printing of Senate Document No. 240, relating to the beet-sugar industry in the United States, which were, in line 6, to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" and, in line 7, to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I move to take up House bill 13860, the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13860) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEARNS. I ask the Senator from Wyoming to yield to me that I may call up a bill.

Mr. WARREN. I feel compelled to yield to the Senator from Utah if his bill leads to no discussion.

Mr. KEARNS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3642) to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of the act of July 27, 1892, as amended by the act of June 27, 1902.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Pensions report to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I regret to state that I have to object to the passage of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BURROWS. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and that is the amendment on page 30 of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the bill was laid over last night, the point of order pending. I shall occupy but a few moments upon the point of order.

I desire to say with reference to the charge that we were late with this proposed amendment or legislation, if it be so called, that, as I explained last night, we waited first until the War Department and the two corps interested had themselves duly considered and had cut down their first estimates and until it was fully known and conceded what were their immediate, crying wants. We waited until the incoming as well as the outgoing principal officers of the War Department had expressed their desires upon this proposed reform.

Now, as to the allegation that none of these matters heretofore has been considered here or elsewhere, so far as the Ordnance Department is concerned, the subject-matter of this desired amendment has twice obtained the consent and approval of the other House.

Therefore your committee felt impelled—since it cost nothing, but saved money in the first instance, and in the long run cost but a trifle more—to offer these amendments and thus afford some relief to these two most deserving corps, which seem to be hampered and thus rendered in a measure inefficient at the present time because the present law does not deal liberally enough with them.

We find that as to the Medical Corps in the last three years there have been but twenty-seven applicants for entrance to the medical college, while in the three years before there were seventy-nine, the reason for the falling off being that not sufficient inducements were offered for medical students to enter the service, compensation and opportunities for promotion and growth being so much greater in the Navy Department and in civil life.

The consequence is that during the last three years resignations have been in the ratio of eleven to one, as compared with the same length of time before the present order of things was inaugurated—not quite the old, oft-repeated "sixteen to one" ratio, but a ratio of eleven to one of resignations now—because there are not sufficient inducements. So we have at the present time 195 contract surgeons working by the day or by the month with no expectation of remaining. Therefore they can not possibly have the same interest that would obtain if we had regular appointees.

Now, in the Ordnance Department matters are still worse. With an authorized corps of only 71 we find that there are but 51 officers in that corps (52 altogether, but 1 out serving on the General Staff, leaving but 51). Under the superintendence of this corps are 5,000 men, skilled mechanics, on duty at various places throughout the United States and elsewhere, having entire charge of the manufacture and use of all our implements and missiles of warfare.

There are 19 vacancies, and why? Because the legislation had three years ago was not liberal enough and did not and does not offer sufficient inducements. Therefore no young officers care to take the necessary course of study to enter that corps, where there is little or no future promise, first, because there is no promotion at the time they enter, and second, because there are so few officers of higher rank—majors, lieutenant-colonels, and colonels—in the corps that an officer stands less chance of promotion in that corps than in the regular line of the Army.

Of course, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] knows, as I know, and as the Senate knows, that if the cold-blooded, bald proposition of a point of order is made on the ground that this amendment is legislation, the Chair has but one course to follow. We understand that very well. We have felt and know that if a proposition as to a point of order is made, it is futile to offer any argument or attempt to prove that the amendment does not tend toward legislation.

So in explaining the urgent needs of these two corps, I have done so without any expectation of changing the ruling of the Chair if the point is insisted upon, but I have wanted to make a foundation for asking unanimous consent of this body, which will, of course, have to include the withdrawal by the Senator from Maine of his point of order, so that this measure, this necessary legislation, this good legislation—if it be legislation—may obtain and remain in the bill.

Mr. President, we all know that we have to have rules, and generally follow them. We all admired the schoolmaster who, in our early times, insisted upon the rules, but we loved the schoolmaster none the less because at times the rules were relaxed for the good of the school and the scholars.

Of course we all admire the Senator from Maine, admire him immensely and intensely, and for nothing more than that generous way and sunny disposition of his that permit him to sit in his place in the Senate and allow needful and proper legislation to go through upon any and all appropriation bills except this one appropriation bill, nem. con., as he remarked yesterday, even to taking the whole Empire of China, treaties, laws, and all, as he so skillfully did a few days since, into the very vitals or body of the regular annual deficiency appropriation bill. I do not know when I admire that Senator most, whether, when in that generous mood, he joins with us, and we legislate for the good of the country, even though it be on appropriation bills, or when he stands here with that grim determination, which also becomes him so well, and insists that one man in the Senate, instead of the Senate itself, shall say whether or not we shall have legislation.

Now, Mr. President, as I said before, the Chair can rule but one way; but if the Senator from Maine, with that goodness of heart that always obtains within him, no matter what his outward demeanor may be, will, in the line of his duty, withdraw his point of order and put it to the Senate on a motion to strike out, and let the Senate decide whether it shall go in or not, it ought to satisfy all demands, and certainly it will satisfy the Committee on Military Affairs. I should feel entirely satisfied personally if the Senate were permitted to vote upon it whether it should go in or not. So I can only appeal to the Senator from Maine to do that which he thinks is best in this case. Let one man settle it or allow the Senate to have a voice in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The next amendment is section 23.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs; which was, on page 30, after line 23, to insert:

SEC. 23. That the Ordnance Department shall consist of one Chief of Ordnance, with the rank of brigadier-general; six colonels; nine lieutenant-colonels; nineteen majors; twenty-five captains; twenty-five first lieutenants, and the enlisted men, including ordnance sergeants, as now authorized by law. The vacancies thus caused or created shall, as far as possible, be filled by promotion according to seniority as now prescribed by law, except that the Chief of Ordnance shall be selected from the permanent officers of the corps for a period of four years. That the vacancies occurring in the grades of captain and first lieutenant of ordnance shall be filled by detail from the Army at large, from the same grade or the grade below for four years, after which no officer shall again be eligible for detail until he has served one year out of the Department: Provided, That officers shall be so detailed, subject to such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and the vacancies thus created shall be filled as now provided for by law. That vacancies occurring in the grade of major of ordnance, after promotion, as now prescribed by law, of all permanent officers now in the Ordnance Department, shall be filled by the appointment of officers of the grade next below, who shall have served by detail in the Ordnance Department, the selection to be made as the result of an examination, approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, at the risk of subjecting myself to the playful encomium of the Senator from Wyoming, I must make the same point of order on this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The next amendment was, to insert, beginning at the top of page 32, the following:

That as carrying out the provisions of section 35 of an act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States, approved February 2, 1901, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, if in his opinion the prices at which the land can be procured are reasonable, to establish four permanent camp grounds and enlarge the Chattanooga and Chickamauga National Park for the instruction and maneuvering of troops of the Regular Army and National Guard at, on, or near the following places, to wit:

(a) In the vicinity of Fort Sam Houston, Bexar County, in the State of Texas, in quantity not less than 18,000 nor more than 25,000 acres.

(b) In the vicinity of Camp Douglas, Juneau and Monroe counties, in the State of Wisconsin, containing 20,000 acres, more or less.

(c) In the Conewago Valley, in the counties of Lebanon, Dauphin, and Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania, containing 18,000 acres, more or less.

(d) On either of the following tracts of land in the State of California, as may be selected by the Secretary of War, namely: The Nacimiento ranch, partly in Monterey County and partly in San Luis Obispo County, containing 24,000 acres, more or less; the Santa Margarita ranch (Murphy ranch), in San Luis Obispo County, containing 18,200 acres, more or less; the J. H. Henry property, in San Luis Obispo County, containing 22,000 acres, more or less; the Santa Cruz property, near the city of Santa Cruz, containing 20,000 acres, more or less.

All of which sites have been examined by officers of the War Department and by them recommended as suitable for the purposes above set forth.

That to enable the Secretary of War to acquire said tracts of land above located the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: For the military camp ground in the vicinity of Fort Sam Houston, $125,000; for the military camp ground in the vicinity of Camp Douglas, $400,000; for the military camp ground in the Conewago Valley, $900,000; for the military camp ground in the State of California, $500,000, and for the enlargement of the Chattanooga and Chickamauga National Park (already established), by the purchase of 10,000 acres of land adjoining said park, the sum of $100,000: Provided, That no permanent military post shall be established, or any steps taken looking toward the establishment of a post, on any of the camps hereby authorized to be purchased without express authority from Congress.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I make a point of order against all in the Military Academy appropriation bill on page 32, page 33, and the first two lines of page 34, because it proposes new and general legislation, it increases appropriations already contained in the bill, and is in violation of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate.

The part of the bill to which I refer is that in regard to establishing four permanent camp grounds and enlarging the Chattanooga and Chickamauga National Park.

It is so clear that the proposed amendment added to the House bill by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs is new and general legislation and that it increases appropriations already contained in the bill and that it is not germane to the subject-matter contained in the Military Academy appropriation bill that I am sure every point of order raised by me should be sustained. I am well aware that the first and second points of order have to be decided by the President of the Senate and that the last, under our rules, will have to be submitted to the Senate. This is very agreeable to me, for I am sure the Senate can not afford to decide that my last point of order is not well taken; and if the President of the Senate shall be required to decide, he, in my opinion, will be compelled to decide that the first and second points of order are well taken. Until my position is assailed or plausible arguments presented to show I am not correct I shall not further discuss the points of order.

In justice to myself I wish to say I am in favor of establishing four permanent camp grounds and enlarging the Chattanooga and Chickamauga National Park for the instruction and maneuvering of troops of the Regular Army and the National Guard, as provided for in the act of Congress of February 2, 1901, but I am in favor of enacting the legislation in a proper way. I want it to be done with proper wisdom and proper deliberation. I do not think that it will be done with proper wisdom by attaching to this general appropriation bill the amendment which has just been read. I do not think that it will be done with proper deliberation if this amendment is hastily brought here without time for proper examination and more than $2,000,000 appropriated.

There is a bill now pending on the Calendar which seeks, as I am informed, to establish four camp sites. It seems to me that the proper way would be to wait and take up the bill pending now on the Calendar. This important legislation should be considered in a separate, independent bill.

Mr. President, I can see no good reason why we should have such undue haste. The appropriation of $2,000,000 to pay for four camp sites is but the beginning. We must remember that we are not establishing four camp sites for one year or for five years, but for many years, and $2,000,000 is but the beginning. It will not be many years until $20,000,000 will have been paid out. Improvements will have to be made.

There are many important questions which should be considered when we select four permanent camp sites. We should take into consideration the topography of the country. We should take into consideration the temperature, the climate, the drainage, the water supply, the railroad facilities, the healthfulness of the place, the kind of country it is, and whether it is suitable for the instruction and for the maneuvers of the troops of the United States Army and the National Guard, because the object of this legislation is to furnish camp sites where there shall be instruction given and maneuvers for the benefit of the soldiers of the Regular Army and the soldiers of the National Guard.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MCCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. While the Senator from Kentucky is telling the Senate about those things that ought to be taken into consideration——

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, can we have order? We can not hear a word the Senator is saying.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply want to supply an item which the modesty of the Senator from Kentucky forbids. I desire to say that the principal thing which the Senate ought to take into consideration is the application of West Point, Ky.

Mr. MCCREARY. I hope and believe the Senator from Texas has the same good opinion of West Point, Ky., that General Bates has, who commanded the troops that assembled there for instruction and for maneuvering purposes last fall. I hope he has the same good opinion that Colonel Wagner, the adjutant-general, has, who was on duty there for some time at the encampment last fall, and also the assistant adjutant-general, Major Parker.

When I was interrupted I was describing the kind of camp sites that I thought we ought to have. I believe there was some investigation made in the House of Representatives; but if there has been any investigation made in the Senate with regard to army camp sites, I do not know of it. I obtained this morning certain reports, maps, etc., contained in a large book with over 1,000 pages. I have had no time to examine these reports, maps, etc., and I say it is due to every Senator, before he is required to vote upon the not temporary, but permanent camp sites, that he should have an opportunity of examining and knowing, without doubt, exactly where the camp sites are to be located and what are their advantages and disadvantages.

If it was only for one year or for five years and the place was not suitable, we would have a remedy; but this is a proposition to establish four permanent army camp sites, and when we have by necessary legislation established them then they are fixed. Therefore I do not believe that it is proper and right that we should hastily attach this amendment to the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] spoke kindly of West Point, in Kentucky. As he mentioned it, I feel I ought to say that last year, as there were no permanent camp sites, a site was selected for a temporary camp of instruction and maneuvers within 15 miles of Louisville, Ky.

In my opinion that camp site possesses every requisite that is needed for a permanent military camp ground. There are seven great railroad trunk lines going into Louisville and two railroads pass through a tract of land containing 40,000 acres situated on the Ohio River near West Point, Ky., where the encampment was last fall. The drainage there is perfect, the climate is good, the water supply is excellent, and the temperature is all that could be desired; it is a rolling country and, according to the statement made by the officers in command of the camp site there last fall, it is in every respect suitable. Indeed, there is no place in the United States, to my knowledge, which is so central to so great an area of country or to such an immense population, or a place so accessible to States from which soldiers both of the United States Army and of the National Guard would come for instruction and for maneuvers.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the reports in full of General Bates, Colonel Wagner, or Major Parker, but I shall read briefly some extracts from the report made by Col. Arthur L. Wagner, colonel and assistant adjutant-general, in which he says:

> The maneuvers at West Point, Ky., furnished a thorough practical test of the suitability of the ground for military purposes and demonstrated that the region in question is admirably adapted to use as a maneuver ground.
> * * * * * * *
>
> I do not know of a single objection that could be urged to this ground that would not at once be removed if the land were owned by the Government.
>
> * * * * * * *
> The geographical advantages of the West Point site are also very great.
>
> West Point, Ky., is so located that it can be readily reached in not more than twenty-four hours' travel by all the organizations of the National Guard of the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and the greater part, at least, of the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia—by more troops, in fact, than it would be desirable to concentrate for instruction at a single point.

Mr. President, all I desire is a fair examination; and if West Point is found to be the proper place for one of these permanent camp sites, I desire that it be selected. If, after full and thorough examination the four permanent camp sites which are referred to in the proposed amendment—one in Pennsylvania, one in Wisconsin, one in California, and one in Texas—are deemed best, and possess the proper requisites for permanent camp grounds, an independent separate bill should be presented providing the necessary legislation, and after full and fair discussion I believe all will be satisfied to submit to the will of the majority.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say. My object has been to show that we should not be too hasty—that we should not try to rush this kind of legislation through the Senate on an appropriation bill. I understood the distinguished Senator from Maine to say that he did not remember in his long service here of an effort to have ever been before made in the Senate to attach such legislation as this to the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not know that the Chair cares to hear any discussion on the point of order. It is perfectly obvious, I think, that the point of order is not well taken. Of course the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] will not contend that the failure of the officials of the War Department to look upon West Point with the eyes of the Senator from Kentucky should have any bearing whatever upon the point of order; nor does the fact that this is a Military Academy appropriation bill and that there should be more time for consideration have any such bearing. The only question is, as I understand it, whether under our rules this proposition is properly in this bill.

Mr. President, the first thing I want to say on the point of order is this: The amendment is clearly an item of appropriation to carry out existing law. In the act to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States, approved February 2, 1901, there is this provision:

> SEC. 35. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause preliminary examinations and surveys to be made for the purpose of selecting four sites with a view to the establishment of permanent camp grounds for instruction of troops of the Regular Army and National Guard, with estimates of the cost of the sites and their equipment with all modern appliances, and for this purpose is authorized to detail such officers of the Army as may be necessary to carry on the preliminary work; and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated for the necessary expense of such work, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress the result of such examination and surveys, and no contract for said sites shall be made nor any obligation incurred until Congress shall approve such selections and appropriate the money therefor.

This item, Mr. President, is an item embracing four camp sites, reported by the officials of the War Department, and estimated for by the Secretary of War pursuant to section 35 of the act to which I have called the Chair's attention. That would seem to be sufficient to bring the amendment entirely within the provision of Rule XVI.

There is another reason why the amendment is in order, Mr. President. It does not change any existing law, and it is not only pursuant to existing legislation and to carry it out, but it has been reported favorably on by a standing committee of this House—the Committee on Military Affairs—which happens to be in charge of this appropriation bill as well as of the army appropriation bill. It is utterly impossible for me to see any possible theory on which this amendment is out of order under Rule XVI.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he contends that a simple provision of law appointing a commission to examine sites and to report the result to Congress binds us in any way to make an appropriation?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not say that it binds the Congress in any way to make the appropriation, but I say the proposition here is that money shall be appropriated to carry out existing law. I speak only to the point of order, not to the question whether or not the appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. GORMAN. I so understood. I am addressing myself to the point of order, but I am amazed that the Senator should hold that a report from a Department, in conformity to a provision of law, that four camp sites are eligible at a cost of $2,000,000, brings the amendment within the provisions of Rule XVI. We have a thousand reports from the different Departments recommending various things; but it has never been before held, so far as I know, that the mere report of information which Congress wants to act upon requires that an appropriation shall be made.

As I understand, an appropriation bill such as that we are now considering for the West Point Military Academy has always, without exception, contained only appropriations provided for by existing law—for the pay of the superintendent, the cadets, and the various officers connected with that institution. Those expenditures are defined and fixed. Heretofore no items relating to the Army in general have ever been inserted or attempted to be inserted in this bill. Yet Senators come here in this particular case with three propositions to reorganize great bureaus of the War Department—the Medical Bureau and the Ordnance Bureau—and the amendment proposing to do that has gone out under the ruling of the Chair. Why? Because there is no law providing for such reorganization.

Now comes the third proposition, to purchase great camp sites, which have no direct connection whatever with the West Point Academy, and for which no estimate has been made, nothing except a huge report from the War Department, giving the result of the examination of army boards; and there is, as I understand, some division in the Department itself in regard to the various sites which the committee report to insert in this bill. This is done in face of the fact that in both Houses of Congress the particular subject is contained in another bill providing for these camp sites. That bill has not been acted upon by either House; and there is no thought on the part of anybody that there is the slightest provision of law for the purchase of these sites.

I suggest to the Senator that it would be very extraordinary, in my judgment, and I think entirely without precedent, if it should be held that such a proposition was germane or that it came under Rule XVI, regarding appropriation bills.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the ruling of the Chair upon the point of order made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was, as I understood it, upon this ground, that it changed existing law. The Ordnance Corps is a corps organized under the act of Congress, as is also the Medical Corps. The two propositions which the Chair ruled out of order undeniably changed existing law.

Now, whether this amendment ought to be on the Military Academy bill or not does not go at all to the point of order raised by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY]. The point of order suggested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] as to whether or not the amendment is germane is an entirely different proposition, which the Chair does not pass upon. I am confining myself to the only question which the Chair is called upon to decide, and that is, whether or not, under the rule, this amendment is in order, regardless of what the Senate may do with it. But as to the point of order that the amendment is not germane, if that shall be made regardless of the question whether the Senate shall have——

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Not until I finish my sentence, if the Senator will permit me.

Regardless of what the Senate may think as to the propriety of putting the amendment on the Military Academy bill, I can see no reason, Mr. President, why this amendment does not fairly fall within the rule, in view of the fact that it has been reported and incorporated in this bill, and not only reported favorably by a standing committee of this body, but has been incorporated in this bill by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, no; by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER. In this case that is the committee on appropriations, and that is the committee which has just as complete jurisdiction of the army appropriation bill and of this Military Academy bill as the Committee on Appropriations has of any bills which come from that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Wisconsin address himself to the question whether or not the amendment is general legislation?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it is general legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must remember that the rule of the Senate is not as to whether an amendment proposes a change of existing law, like the rule of the other House, but it is as to whether an amendment which proposes general legislation shall be placed on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the amendment is general legislation any more than the incorporation on the naval bill, as it comes from the Committee on Naval Affairs, of an amendment providing for an $8,000,000 battle ship is general legislation.

These camp sites are estimated for by the Secretary of War, earnestly recommended by the Secretary of War, and the whole subject, in obedience to this act of Congress, was thoroughly investigated by competent officers of the War Department, quite as able, I think, to determine what the interest of the Government from the military standpoint is, and what camp sites are best adapted for that use, as the Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator.

It is an item in an appropriation bill looking to the expenditure of money for army purposes. Now, how is that general legislation any more than a thousand items that come from the Appropriations Committee and from the Naval Committee are general legislation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There were two items which have been ruled out—which were ruled out on the point that they were general legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. They changed the permanent provisions of existing law.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, they are incorporated into the general law and applicable to the whole country.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; they are applicable to the whole country.

Mr. FORAKER. And it is pure and simple special legislation. There is nothing general about it. The pending amendment is to authorize the purchase of great camp sites, and it is as completely special as anything could possibly be.

Mr. SPOONER. Not any more than it would be general legislation to authorize the purchase of a site for the erection of a military hospital.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. President, I raised the point of order because the amendment proposed as part of this bill contained new and general legislation. If this amendment is not general legislation, providing, as it does, for four army camp sites, providing for the sending of the National Guard to them from every part of the United States, and providing for an appropriation of $2,000,000 to begin with and many millions hereafter, I should like to know what general legislation is.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is not asking me a question.

Mr. MCCREARY. I want to say before I take my seat that in addition to making the point of order against the amendment that it proposed new and general legislation, that it increased an appropriation already contained in the bill, I also stated that it violated Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate. Section 3 of that rule is as follows:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

Mr. SPOONER. I shall not discuss the question of germaneness, because, under the rule, the Chair submits that to the Senate, but I am confining myself now to the point of order raised by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], which is for the Chair to decide. The Senator from Kentucky says——

Mr. McCREARY. I wish the Senator from Wisconsin to understand that I am not only raising the question that the amendment proposes general legislation, but also I am making the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the pending bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I think any appropriation which looks to the operations of the Army is, so far as that is concerned, sufficiently germane.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to submit the last point of order raised by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; I know that, and I said that; but the rule in relation to the other point that I am devoting myself to for the moment says:

> Or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

This amendment was moved not only by direction of a standing committee of the Senate, but was incorporated in the bill by the Committee on Appropriations, when the bill came from the committee to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is in no trouble about that: the Chair is only troubled about the question of whether or not the amendment proposes general legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, how could it be general legislation? The Senator from Kentucky thinks, or seems to think, because the amendment involves four sites, it is general legislation, inferring perhaps that if it only involved one it would not be general legislation.

The amount appropriated has nothing to do with the question, nor has the number of sites in this proposition anything to do with the question. How is it to be distinguished from a proposition to fortify Pearl Harbor, if you please, or to fortify some place in the United States, which is permanent in its nature? That is essential to military operations. It is defensive in character, and how is that general legislation any more than is this? It is difficult to define—I have never heard any Senator attempt to define—the distinction between special legislation and general legislation. But under our practice here, this amendment certainly is not general legislation. Suppose it were proposed to erect military hospitals in two or three parts of the country for the use of the Army, and to incorporate that provision, not only by direction of a standing committee, not only pursuant to the recommendation of the Secretary of War and an estimate for the expense, but to incorporate it by the Appropriations Committee; would that be general legislation?

It is for the use of the Army. Congress is committed to this policy after having carefully provided for the organization of the Militia of the United States to rendezvous in the country at convenient points for the Regular Army and the militia of the States. The utility of that is obvious. The Secretary of War considers it so obvious that he urges this appropriation in a communication which will be brought to the attention of the Senate. If this amendment is general legislation, we violate that rule on every appropriation bill. It seems to me that it can not be so considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits to the Senate the point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], that the pending amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in regard to the question of whether or not the amendment is general legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not this is a proper subject for legislation at this time, but if the amendment is not general legislation, I can not conceive of any proposition that would be. It proposes to change the policy of the Government, to inaugurate, in fact, an entirely new policy by the establishment of camp sites, and assembling, in a way which has never been provided by law, of the Militia and the Regular Army, involving an enormous expenditure to the Government.

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ALDRICH. In a moment. Is it possible on a bill to provide for the necessary expenses of the Military Academy to justify legislation of this kind?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. What is general legislation as contradistinguished from legislation that is not general legislation?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is usual general legislation of Congress. Take the case of the pending bill. Any amendment would be general legislation which proposed to change the policy of Congress or the adoption of a new policy.

Mr. SPOONER. This bill does not provide for changing the policy of Congress.

Mr. ALDRICH. It does, most certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Congress has already adopted it as a policy.

Mr. QUARLES. If the Senator will look into the militia act, he will see——

Mr. ALDRICH. What will he find?

Mr. QUARLES. He will find there an entire change of policy, which was agreed to and incorporated into the law, and this is only carrying that out.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish the Senator would read the provision of the militia act which would make this appropriation proper.

Mr. QUARLES. That act provides for maneuvers of the Militia and of the Regular Army at rendezvous to be appointed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. QUARLES. And you can not carry out that militia act without having those rendezvous. You have either got to rent them or to buy them, and in my own time, later on, I shall try to show the Senate the relative merit of those two propositions.

Mr. ALDRICH. The militia act provides for rendezvous by general legislation, and this provides for the extension by general legislation of the policy which the Senator says was inaugurated.

Mr. QUARLES. Yes; it carries it out.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will venture to say that there was not a member of this Senate who had any idea, in the passage of the militia bill, that we were entering upon an expenditure of $50,000,000 to establish what are called "permanent camp sites" by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. It may not have been practicable for every member of the Senate to know what was in the bill before he voted for it, but that is the law.

Mr. ALDRICH. The law may be as the Senator states, but it certainly was simply a suggestion, at most, in the direction which we are now asked to go.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not suppose it was simply a suggestion; it must have been a general suggestion.

Will the Senator define "general legislation" under the rules?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have defined it as something which does not——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to define "special legislation?"

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will allow me to go on.

Mr. FORAKER. I will, of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will ask both Senators to allow me to go on, and then I shall be able to answer their questions in my own way.

Mr. QUARLES. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to ask whether his idea of general legislation depends upon the amount of money which is involved in a particular proposition?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at all.

Mr. QUARLES. That seems to be the only clear suggestion the Senator has yet made.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at all. It is not, of course, a question of the amount of money involved. That is not the question; although, for the judgment of the Senate, whether the proposition involves 50 cents or $50,000,000, is, I assume, worthy of consideration. That is a matter to be taken into consideration.

Mr. QUARLES. Not on the point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; not on the point of order.

Mr. QUARLES. That is what we are discussing.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose there were a proposition here, there being urgent need for it, to appropriate $16,000,000 for two battle ships. Would that be general legislation?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would.

Mr. ALDRICH. On an amendment to this bill?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it would.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Why?

Mr. ALDRICH. Because it would be entirely foreign——

Mr. SPOONER. Why any more general legislation on this bill than if reported as a new proposition from the Naval Committee?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a different proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. Every proposition is different, of course. When a man wants to defeat a proposition, he calls it general legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator will recognize the fact that the Government is committed to the establishment and maintenance of a navy as a policy which has been in existence from the foundation of the Government. If it were proposed upon this bill to raise a standing army of 100,000 or 200,000 men——

Mr. SPOONER. Does the number make any difference?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; to raise a standing army of 200,000 men and providing for their organization and government in various ways it would be general legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be changing existing law and would be general legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. This changes existing law.

Mr. QUARLES. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no question but that this changes existing law and establishes a new policy. It is general legislation in the sense that it is committing Congress to a policy to which it has never before been committed. Special legislation, of course, is not confined to appropriations for private purposes. I think the Senator will not contend that an appropriation for a specific purpose must necessarily be special legislation. I do not think any Senator will so contend.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator's definition, his test, as to general legislation, under the rule, is whether it commits the country to a new policy.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; or changes the policy of the Government in regard to matters of general concern. That is my definition.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I am very glad at last to know what is the basic of the proposition of my distinguished friend underlying the point of order. We find it is this, that that is special legislation within the meaning of Rule XVI which establishes a new policy. Therefore this proposition is not obnoxious to Rule XVI if it does not establish a new order of things or commit Congress to a new policy. Very well.

Mr. President, I want to say to my distinguished friend and to the Senate that since the organization of this Government Congress never was more thoroughly committed to a policy than it has been to the maneuvering of the troops—the Militia and the Regular Army—in great maneuver grounds by the passage of what is known as the "militia bill." That is the existing law, and if my friend will take the trouble to examine the statute he will find that there the very policy we are contending for was thoroughly and completely established.

Mr. ALDRICH. Was there any suggestion in that bill that the Government was to purchase sites? Was there any committal on the part of the Government to the purchase of sites?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. There is in that bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly; and I will show the Senator later on. I am speaking now of the militia bill, pure and simple.

Now, what was the policy of this Government as it was presented in the militia bill?—and I wish every Senator to see how thoroughly Congress has been committed to this policy. What was it? Instead of having a feeble, independent body of militia raised in the several States, it was to amalgamate that force of citizens with your regular army force.

It was to bring them together into a great camp where maneuvers could be had; where the citizen soldiery of the country could stand shoulder to shoulder with the seasoned old veterans in the Regular Army. It was the policy, to amalgamate those forces in one and have one great military establishment consisting of the Militia and the regular force. Not only that, but later on Congress, in furtherance of that policy, directed that an investigation should be made into the available sites in this country, and it is known as section 35 of the appropriation act of 1901. Now, here is the provision:

> That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause preliminary examinations and surveys to be made for the purpose of selecting four sites, with a view to the establishment of permanent camp grounds for the instruction of troops of the Regular Army and National Guard—

Now, let the Senator listen—> with estimates of the cost of the sites.

Did that contemplate their purchase?

Mr. ALDRICH. If Congress should order an examination of the port of New York with a view of ascertaining whether it was desirable to build large fortifications or to deepen the channel to a hundred feet, would that commit Congress to the deepening of the channel to a hundred feet?

Mr. QUARLES. Let us not get away from the question.

Mr. ALDRICH. The suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin is that because we have asked the board to examine, therefore we are committed to a policy.

Mr. QUARLES. The contention of the distinguished Senator on the point of order was that for the first time this amendment committed the Government to this policy.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly it does, according to the Senator's own statement.

Mr. QUARLES. The Senator will not abide by the proposition, but constantly wanders away from it. I say that Congress was committed to this policy when it authorized the Secretary of War to cause this investigation to be made and estimates to be furnished for the cost of the four sites; and this bill, Mr. President, is only in continuance of the policy which has thus been twice adopted by Congress.

Mr. HALE. Where is the estimate?

Mr. QUARLES. Section 35——

Mr. HALE. No, the estimate. Where is the estimate regularly sent from the War Department to the Secretary of the Treasury and submitted to Congress as an estimate for the present year? I have looked, and I have thus far failed to find that there has been any estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury this year.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine what that has to do with the question whether this is general or special legislation—whether or not there has been an estimate? I do not see the pertinency of the inquiry, so far as this question is concerned.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] has again and again referred to Congress being committed because it provided that there should be estimates made. Now, the first question that would arise upon that, to any Senator used to procedure in connection with appropriation bills, would be where is the estimate that justifies this? The Senator himself brings up the question by saying here was an inquiry which involved estimates. I have looked over the Book of Estimates and tried to find any estimate sent in for these sites, saying nothing on the question as to what bill it should be upon.

But where is there any estimate sent to Congress this year, at this session, by the Secretary of the Treasury, making this a regular estimate? If the Senator has found that, he has searched deeper than I have. But I have looked far and wide, and can find no estimate.

Mr. QUARLES. I am not to be diverted from a discussion of the proposition which was raised by my distinguished friend the Senator from Rhode Island, which is an entirely different question from that now raised by the distinguished Senator from Maine. Let us treat that when we reach it. The question now is whether the objection made by the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island is sound, that this amendment for the first time commits Congress to a new policy. It was upon that proposition that I suggested that the act of Congress providing that the Secretary of War should cause the Engineer Corps to make an investigation and report estimates of cost showed conclusively that the position taken by the learned Senator from Rhode Island on the point of order is not tenable.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], while making his point of order, suggested that there was some great haste manifested in this provision. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the large volume I hold in my hand, containing between eight and nine hundred printed pages, is devoted entirely to the report of the engineer officers of the Government upon this subject.

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. MCCREARY. Was that taken in the House of Representatives or was it taken by the committee of the Senate?

Mr. QUARLES. I do not understand the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. MCCREARY. Who took that evidence? Who furnished it?

Mr. QUARLES. It is furnished by the engineer officers of this Government, who were detailed by the Secretary of War, pursuant to the provision I have just read.

Mr. MCCREARY. Was it sent to the Senate or to the House of Representatives? Was it sent for the information of the Members of the House or of the members of the Senate?

Mr. QUARLES. It was sent to both committees—the Military Committee of both Houses.

Mr. MCCREARY. How long has the Senator had that report or that evidence before him?

Mr. QUARLES. It was sent in at the last session.

Mr. MCCREARY. I never saw it. It is new to me.

Mr. QUARLES. It has been perused by committees of both Houses, and not only that, but extended hearings have been had by the committee of the House, and the merits of all these sites have been considered; the questions have been matured, and in the regular way arguments have been had, and the Military Committee of the House reported in favor of this measure, as did the committee of the Senate.

Mr. MCCREARY. Is it not true that there is a bill on the Calendar substantially the same as this proposed amendment?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. MCCREARY. Then why not take up the bill separately and independently and consider it? Why do you attach this as an amendment to the Military Academy bill?

Mr. QUARLES. I had occasion the other day, in some desultory remarks that I made here, to indicate a reason which is all sufficient to anybody who has investigated that subject. In another place it is impossible to get consideration of this or any similar measure—absolutely impossible—although both committees have reported in favor of it. I am not permitted to criticise that condition of things, but I state it as a fact.

Now, I wish the Senate to give attention, if they will, for a moment——

Mr. HOPKINS. In view of that statement, would not the putting of this amendment on the pending bill endanger the appropriation bill?

Mr. QUARLES. I do not think so, Mr. President. If it goes into the appropriation bill as the proposition of the Senate, it becomes ingrafted into that bill, and when it goes to the House it is not an amendment. It is a substantial, integral portion of the bill, and no point of order can be raised there upon it, because it is not in the form of an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is an amendment of the House bill.

Mr. QUARLES. I understand so. It is an amendment, but if the Senate puts it on, it becomes a part of the bill when it goes back to the House, and is not open to a point of order there.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely that; but of course the House has either to agree to it or to reject it.

Mr. QUARLES. I understand that, of course, Mr. President.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the point I desired to make to the Senator is that under the statement he makes that the House is opposed to this legislation——

Mr. QUARLES. I did not say that. The House is not opposed to it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understood the Senator to say that this legislation could not pass in the other body; and that being true, it seems to me it would be a little dangerous for the Senate to put it on this bill, as endangering the appropriation for the West Point Academy.

Mr. QUARLES. The only reason why it can not pass in the House, if I understand the sentiment of the other body, is that no man can receive recognition to bring it before the House. That is the difficulty.

Mr. President, if I may be permitted to take a few moments of the time of the Senate, I wish to call attention to an experiment that has been made already by the Government in regard to these maneuvers. It is apparent that if the policy enacted in the militia law is to be carried out we must have great sites, we must have great camping grounds where the maneuvers can be held. There are but two ways in which that can be done. One is to rent the sites, and the other is to buy them.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate now to the fact that the Government has already experimented on the first proposition of renting sites, and I wish the Senate to know what the result of that experiment has been. Then the Senate will see that there is no alternative except to purchase the sites. Last year the maneuvers were provided for on two sites; one the site in Kentucky, which my friend the Senator from Kentucky has described with such persuasive eloquence that I came to think that if the amendment had only dealt with that part of Kentucky known as "West Point," upon which God has showered all of those manifold blessings, there would have been no objection by way of a point of order.

These two camp grounds were rented, one at West Point, Ky., and the other at Fort Riley, in Kansas.

I hold in my hand a bundle of claims which were presented to our committee after those maneuvers had been held upon the leased camp grounds, and I wish the Senate to understand that from those bills we were given to understand that after our troops had got to West Point, Ky., terrible things happened in that neighborhood. Judging from these claims, we might infer that fat cattle became mere attenuated shadows by reason of the noise incident to that maneuver; that there were no chickens and no turkeys left within 5 miles of that camp; that the calves there refused to grow and presented a case of arrested development; that the pigs there, imbued with the martial spirit of the camp, proceeded to impale themselves upon bayonets; and there was no end of bills presented. I send to the desk a letter, which I ask to have read, written by somebody in Kentucky, who is interested, as to the effect of the maneuvers upon that ground. Will the Secretary kindly read it for the benefit of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

STITHTON, KY., February 1, 1904.

Hon. Mr. HULL, Chairman.

SIR: Hon. D. H. SMITH has in his hands a minority protest of 151 citizens living within proposed limits of West Point location for army post, who ask that the post be not established, as they do not want to be driven from their homes. Would it be too much to ask that this protest be made a part of the record in the premises? Hoping that this may meet your approval, I am,

Very respectfully,

E. T. CARRICO.

We think the sentiment against the establishment at this place much greater than would appear at present.

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Secretary also read——

Mr. McCREARY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. In answer to the letter which has just been read I wish to make a statement in regard to the number who have petitioned for this army camp site. I am informed that between three and four thousand persons in Kentucky, and within the scope of the country proposed to be taken and around there, have petitioned for this army site. I am also informed that the persons who own the land, 40,000 acres of land, have executed writings giving to certain persons options on this land, showing their desire that it be taken for an army site.

Mr. QUARLES. I also ask the Secretary to read the report that comes from Fort Riley.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is this as bearing upon the point of order?

Mr. QUARLES. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object.

Mr. QUARLES. It is following up the line of events.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Before the Senator from Wisconsin leaves the branch of the subject he is discussing, I wish he would state to the Senate what was the aggregate amount of the claims presented from the West Point camp.

Mr. QUARLES. I can not answer the question, except to say that for Fort Riley and West Point they aggregrated $8,000.

Mr. BLACKBURN. For the two?

Mr. QUARLES. For the two.

Now, will the Secretary read what the people of Fort Riley think about this matter? And I will say that this paper is signed by a hundred or a hundred and fifty of the farmers around there.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the United States Senate:

Whereas during the military maneuvers held at Fort Riley, Kans., and vicinity October 16 to 31, 1903, the troops did, in a number of instances, seize and use as battlefields and maneuver grounds the farms of persons who weeks previously had notified the military authorities in writing that their farms had not been leased to the United States Government for the maneuvers, the owners of said farms suffering great loss and annoyance by the action of the troops in the destruction of fences, scattering and injuring live stock, destruction of crops, trampling of fields and meadows, and stoppage of farm work; and

Whereas many landowners and tenants who did lease their farms for the maneuvers of 1903 did so under a misunderstanding and are now strenuously opposed to a repetition of the maneuvers over their farms: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the undersigned landowners and tenants of Ogden Township, Riley County, Kans., consider the action of the military in forcibly seizing farms and destroying property as contrary to the cherished principles of good government and liberty upon which this Republic is founded, and a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the United States Constitution; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby protest against the military maneuvering on our farms, and do pledge ourselves that we will not lease our lands to the Government for maneuver purposes in the future.

JULIUS A. JORDAN
(And others).

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I presume the experience which the Government had in trying to lease these camp sites may have been persuasive with the Secretary of War when he sent his letter to Congress holding that it was absolutely necessary to carry out existing law that Congress should buy four sites at this time. That letter is connected with and a part of the report made by the Senate committee, and can be had by any Senator. I will not stop to read it. But it urges in the most emphatic terms not only the necessity of having these four sites, but the urgent necessity of having them at once.

Mr. President, one word in regard to the point of order that this is general legislation. For instance, the Navy desired to buy an additional tract of land, as we did at the last session. It was suggested that they needed more land for the accommodation of a navy-yard. The proposition was to purchase so many acres. Now, what was that? It was a mere effort to obtain increased facilities for the Navy—that is all. That is all this is, so far as the Army is concerned. It is a proposition to secure and acquire additional facilities for the Army, as the other bill did for the Navy.

Now, would any man stand on this floor and say that the proposition to enlarge a navy-yard was general legislation? If that is true, then almost every one of these provisions in the appropriation bills invades that principle. But it is not true. Mr. President, general legislation is that legislation which lays down a general rule, a general law, or as they say in the House, under the peculiar language of their rules, which contravenes existing law.

Now, those two propositions are not the same, I know; but when this is a specific proposition to afford an additional facility for the Army in line with the legislation of Congress heretofore intended to carry it out, not to contravene any legislation heretofore had, not to change a word or a line or a syllable of it, but merely to carry it out, I say it is a reductio ad absurdum to say that it is general legislation within the meaning of Rule XVI.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Senator agree that the point of order was well taken against sections 18 and 23 of this bill, relating to the Medical Department and the Ordnance Department?

Mr. QUARLES. If I were to make that confession, it would have no bearing, in my judgment, upon this proposition, which is entirely a distinct one.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator has laid down the rule what general legislation is; and I asked him a question. I do not care whether he answers it or not. Of course, he can do as he pleases about it.

Mr. FORAKER. I am pretty familiar with these different provisions, and those sections are not at all like the pending amendment. I think the point of order was well made as against the sections relating to the Medical Department and the Ordnance Department, but it is not at all good here; and when the Senator from Wisconsin concludes I hope I can make that clear enough for anyone to understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. And I shall endeavor to make the contrary plain.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, general legislation is providing a general rule or action. A law is a rule of action. A general law is a law which applies to all alike, and is therefore general legislation.

Now, take the provision for remodeling the Medical Corps. Congress had already legislated on that subject and had provided a general scheme which was embodied in the statute. That was a general scheme which involved all the details of the Medical Corps, the manner of appointment, the manner of promotion, and it obtained everywhere within the United States of America. In that way it was a general proposition, a general rule of action, to govern wherever the Medical Corps was dealt with within the United States. So with the Engineer Corps, there was another scheme distinct in itself which was general because it obtained wherever the Engineer Corps went. It controlled their promotions, the number of colonels, the number of majors, the number of captains they were to have, and what duties they were to perform. It may be said to be a general scheme.

Mr. WARREN. And yet it went through in the army appropriation bill.

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly. It went through on the army appropriation bill; and it never before has been challenged, so far as I know. But taking the ground of my distinguished friend from New Hampshire as being sound, which I do not yield, can not the Senator see the distinction between buying 5 acres of ground for an addition to a navy-yard and laying down a rule forever to control a great corps of the Army?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. QUARLES. One is a general rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have listened very attentively during the present session of Congress to two or three eloquent speeches laying down the principle that the distinction between general legislation and special legislation is that special legislation expired at the end of the Congress. The Senator from Ohio enlightened us on that subject once.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. To what Senator from Ohio does the Senator from New Hampshire refer?

Mr. GALLINGER. To the Senator who has the floor at the present time.

Mr. FORAKER. On what occasion was it that the Senator from Ohio ever advanced such a proposition?

Mr. GALLINGER. I remember it very distinctly. I can not refer the Senator to the hour or the day.

Mr. FORAKER. What was the subject-matter?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was a question very similar to this.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire is certainly mistaken. I never advanced such a proposition, I am quite sure I can safely say.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I can call the attention of the Senator to it, if I may be given the requisite time.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will do it.

This is a matter in which I have no interest, as far as these camp sites are concerned, but I think we all should be interested in having a correct ruling made as to what is general legislation, now that the question has been raised. I never advanced such a proposition intelligently; I never did it knowingly, as that which the Senator attributes to me, and I will be quite mortified if I find in the RECORD that I made any such proposition as that the distinction between general and special legislation is that special legislation terminates at the end of the session.

Mr. GALLINGER. The presiding officer, the President pro tempore of the Senate, in a very elaborate opinion expressed that same view, I will say.

I do not agree with the Senator from Wisconsin, who seemed to be addressing his remarks to me particularly, that to create general legislation it is necessary to have something that applies to every hamlet in the United States. I do not agree to the proposition that it must cover the entire United States and become applicable to every State and perhaps every municipality. I do not know how that may be.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator does not do me the honor to state fairly my proposition——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. QUARLES. Although I have no doubt he intended so to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad the Senator qualified his remark.

Mr. QUARLES. I certainly would never expect anything but the most kindly and courteous treatment and the fairest consideration from my distinguished friend, and I did not mean to intimate anything else.

Mr. President, let me state it now in another way, because I have been, perhaps, unfortunate, for no one will comprehend a proposition more quickly than my distinguished friend. I want at least to make myself understood, and if I am wrong the Senator will be entirely ready to correct me. I want to emphasize the distinction between a bill to regulate the United States Army, for instance, and a bill to buy a gun or a plat of ground for the use of that Army. You lay down a law here for the government of the Army. The regulation that is put into the law to control that Army is a general regulation. That is general legislation, because it extends over all the United States and its colonies and dependencies, wherever our flag flies.

Now, that would be general legislation, according to my view, and so it is in a minor degree with reference to a corps in the Army. Take the Engineer Corps, for instance. A general scheme provided by law to control the Engineer Corps is general legislation, because it applies to that corps wherever it may be, in time of war or peace, and is a general rule of action for that corps.

Now, as distinguished from that general control of the Army or of a corps in the Army, which may well be said to be general, how is it with a bill to provide a battle ship, a bill to provide 5 acres of ground, a bill to provide a gun for the use of the Army?

Mr. SPOONER. Or for a hospital?

Mr. QUARLES. Or for the building of a hospital.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just on that point, I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if the naval appropriation bill had come over here providing for five battle ships, and the Senator had offered an amendment on the floor increasing the number to ten, does he not think a point of order would lie against that amendment?

Mr. QUARLES. That would be obnoxious to another provision in Rule XVI.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose the Committee on Naval Affairs had reported an amendment increasing the number to ten, would it then have been subject to a point of order?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. QUARLES. As general legislation?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not say as general legislation; but it would be obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. QUARLES. That is not what we are discussing. There is another reason why it might be obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. Let us take another illustration, which my distinguished colleague suggests to me. Here is the Medical Corps. They need a hospital in a given place. Is a provision in an appropriation bill giving them a hospital to consist of an acre of ground and $20,000 to construct a building on it to be considered in the same light with reference to this point of order as a proposition that goes to the entire control and regulation and management of that corps throughout the United States? Is there not a manifest distinction? The one lays down a general rule of action, that is a general law; the other provides for a specific appropriation of money to acquire a particular facility. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the point is as distinct as it can be.

Now, if the Senate will bear with me just one moment, I want to say a word regarding the matter of the relevancy. I fear that I am taking up too much time, but I feel a very great interest in this matter. When the Senate vote on the question, if they have to, as to whether the amendment is germane to the bill, I ask them to remember this proposition: What is the Military Academy? It is an establishment for the training of young men who are to become officers of our Army. That is all it is. What is the maneuvering that is provided for in this bill? It is for the training of the militia of this country, pure and simple.

Mr. SPOONER. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It stands in the same relation to the subject exactly as a naval training station did to the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. QUARLES. Precisely. I am thankful for the suggestion.

Mr. HALE. No; the naval training station is for the purpose of educating landsmen to go into the service and man the ships. It has nothing to do with drilling or training.

Mr. SPOONER. The camp site is for the purpose of educating soldiers to go into battle.

Mr. HALE. No; the naval station is for educating the young men who go into the Navy. It is not training and drilling; it is taking landsmen and making sailors of them.

Mr. SPOONER. This is taking landsmen and making soldiers of them.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; this is maneuvering and all that.

Mr. SPOONER. What is maneuvering but training?

Mr. HALE. But the naval training station has nothing to do with maneuvering.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, it is utterly impossible, without resorting to casuistry, to draw any line between the two as a matter of principle. The policy of the Government has been laid down in the militia bill, as I said, that these two forces should be amalgamated, that they should be trained together; that the landsman from the farm and the office and the shop, green and untrained, shall be brought into a maneuvering camp where he has a chance to witness the maneuvers of the Regular Army. The purpose is to hold those two forces together so that we may have a more efficient defense.

Mr. HALE. A defense against what?

Mr. QUARLES. Against everything for which we provide an army.

Mr. SPOONER. Or a navy.

Mr. QUARLES. Or a navy.

Mr. HALE. That is, that there is to be practically an immense army comprising both the regular and the militia force. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I shall not permit my distinguished friend to phrase that proposition for me. I shall not adopt his language; but the idea is not far from correct.

Mr. HALE. I thought so.

Mr. QUARLES. The idea of the militia bill is to bring those two forces together for the purpose of education, for the purpose of making better soldiers out of the citizen soldiery of this country. That is what it is for. So these two facilities work in harmony. One is a corollary of the other; one is the supplement of the other. The West Point Academy is to drill officers so that they may become a distinguished body of officers in our Army, and the camp-site provision is to take the green levies and recruits in the militia and make them better and more serviceable soldiers.

So there is an affinity between the two propositions. They are alike; they belong to each other, and they can not be segregated without interfering with the will of Congress as it has been distinctly announced by former legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does he think an amendment to this amendment would be proper to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase sites for the naval reserves, to provide buildings and ships and various paraphernalia of that kind?

Mr. QUARLES. It would not be germane to the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why not?

Mr. QUARLES. Because it does not relate to a matter of the naval forces of the Government or the naval defense. Therefore, to bring into this army bill providing for camp sites a proposition to effectuate the Navy would make it obnoxious to the rule. It is not relevant or germane.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not an army bill.

Mr. QUARLES. It is.

Mr. HALE. It is the West Point Academy bill.

Mr. QUARLES. Well, my friends may draw these distinctions, and I shall not assume to follow them in that line. They are both far better equipped than I to draw a nice distinction. But I say the comparison made by my distinguished friend is entirely unsound; that it would reveal another objection, not the one we are discussing here.

We are discussing now whether this is general legislation, and that is all. We are not discussing the question as to whether it is germane to the bill except only as I have ventured to say that when Senators vote upon this proposition I hope they will understand that under the new policy of Congress, enacted in the militia law, this is not only necessary but it is right in the line with the very objects and purposes of the Military Academy appropriation bill. It is an academy, if you please, in the broadest sense, extended to our militia, and not confined to those fortunate youths who may find their way into that great national training school.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I wish to say in the first place that I have no interest whatever in this question except only in so far as I am interested, as every other Senator should be, in the ruling that the Chair must make on so important a question as whether this is special or general legislation, or, to put it more precisely, whether or not this is general legislation. These camp sites are not situated, any of them, in my State or anywhere in the neighborhood of my State, and I do not know that there ever will be one situated there. Whether it is good or wise policy to procure these sites and pay out this money for them is something that I do not propose to address myself to.

I shall confine myself to the sole question whether or not this is general legislation, for if it be not general legislation then it is not subject to the point of order that has been made.

In this connection the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has said that on some occasion heretofore I have insisted that the distinction which determines whether legislation is special or general is whether or not it expires with the session at which it is enacted. I have no recollection of having ever made any such contention as that. Certainly, I have no sympathy with any such point now, and I am sure the Senator has attributed to me something that should have been attributed to some other Senator.

The distinction between special and general legislation is sometimes confusing, and yet it is, as a rule, broad enough for us not to make any mistake about it—certainly not in this case.

The Senator from New Hampshire has given us a good illustration of the difference by calling our attention to the character of the provisions with respect to the Medical Corps and the Ordnance Bureau, that have already gone out upon the point of order that they were general legislation.

It is plain that they were general legislation. They were subject to that point of order, and the ruling of the Chair in that case was perfectly proper. But you will see in a moment the difference between that proposed legislation and that which is now under consideration when attention is called to the fact that the provisions with respect to the Medical Corps and the Ordnance Bureau were provisions amending a general law and establishing a general rule with respect to the government and the constitution and organization of those departments. At page 30 of the bill those amendments are found. They read:

That sections 18 and 23 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," approved February 2, 1901, are hereby amended to read as follows.

That is as far as I need to read. The amendments then go on to so change the general law by amendment as to provide for a different construction and organization of these departments, and those amendments become the general law of the land applicable to those established and authorized departments.

But when you come to the amendment that is now under consideration, it is wholly different in that respect. It reads as follows:

That as carrying out the provisions of section 35 of an act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States, approved February 2, 1901, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed—

In other words, Mr. President, there is no amendment by this amendment of a general law. This is an amendment intended to carry out the provision of the general law now on the statute books and in force. It stands by itself——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose this section, instead of being in its present form, had provided for an appropriation of $2,000,000 to carry out the provisions of a certain act approved, etc., would it have been effective? Would it have reached any purpose contemplated by this proposed statute?

Mr. FORAKER. No; it would not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course not.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly not; and there is no argument in that, as I understand it, as the Senator seems to think there is. Now, let us look at the nature of this provision. If in the act to which this relates there had been a provision for the selection of certain described camp sites and we had now come to appropriate $2,000,000 to purchase those particular sites there might have been something in what the Senator has suggested.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly, if general legislation contained in this bill had been contained in another bill, then it would have been there; but it is not there.

Mr. FORAKER. No; that is not the point. The Senator asked me whether or not we could make an appropriation of $2,000,000 to carry out the provisions of a former law that we enacted; a law already in force; whether or not that would have had any effect. I say it would not have had any effect, because no camp sites had been determined upon, none had been selected: there was nothing that the Secretary of War could have appled the appropriation to in exercising the power to purchase which we are seeking to confer upon him.

But I do not want to be diverted by that. As I said a while ago, the distinction is easily made between what is general legislation and what is special legislation.

When the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] had the floor a moment ago, he pointed it out in a broad way, but he did not cite any authorities. His contention was that general legislation is that which applies to the whole country or to a whole class of individuals or subjects, and that special legislation is that which applies to a locality or to an individual or to some particular thing, and that is the well-recognized distinction between special and general legislation that runs through all the authorities.

First, I want to call attention to the distinction as given in the Century Dictionary:

General legislation is—

Says the Century Dictionary—

that legislation which is applicable throughout the state generally, as distinguished from special legislation, which affects only particular persons or localities.

Now, this legislation which is proposed does not affect the country generally. It affects particular localities. It affects particular things. Now, let me distinguish.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator hold that this legislation only affects the sites that are mentioned?

Mr. FORAKER. I hold that this simply authorizes the purchase of four designated and described camp sites.

Mr. HALE. The definition given there is an admirable definition.

Mr. FORAKER. It is an admirable definition for the purpose I have in view, but it does not subserve the purpose of the Senator, and, as the Senator knows very well, it does not answer or support the view he is trying to enforce. Let me indicate again as to the difference between special legislation, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. He said a while ago this is general legislation, because although it provides for the purchase of four particular camp sites, yet the whole country pays for these camp sites.

The Senator from New Hampshire has been for many years the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and has labored in that position in such a way as to excite the admiration of everybody in this body. We never had an abler chairman in that place, and with all due regard to those who are there now, they have a good example to emulate, though they are doing splendidly. But the Senator had frequent occasion when acting in that capacity to consider the difference between special and general legislation. General legislation was that which provided that all persons of a certain class should be pensioned thus and so. Special legislation was that which provided that John Jones should have a pension of $6 a month or $12 a month. The country paid in both cases, but that did not make a special act general. There is nothing in the argument that because the Treasury is to be called upon to foot the bill in a given case it is general legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would enlarge my suggestion, if it would suit the Senator. This applies to the entire Army of the United States. It can not by any possibility be said that this matter applies to the four States that are going to have these sites. It is a general provision relating to the Army. It is proposed to rendezvous the army from New Hampshire, I suppose, as well as from Wisconsin.

Mr. QUARLES. And I suppose the purchase of a gun would be on the same footing, because the whole Army might use it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I do not see how the whole Army could use one gun. Perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin can.

Mr. QUARLES. At different times; not at the same time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator's suggestion is not applicable to the point I tried to make.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, let me illustrate again. Here is a law, general in its character, enacted, providing that the Secretary of War shall cause preliminary surveys and examinations to be made with a view to the selection, when Congress authorizes it, of four camp sites. He was authorized to do that. He did it, and he has made a report upon it.

We now appropriate money necessary to purchase the four sites upon which he has made a report. We name them specifically and appropriate for each in turn. That is not a general law of the country. It is an appropriation to carry out a specific purpose. It is money to be applied in a specific way. It does not apply to all camp sites or to any class of camp sites. That is special legislation and nothing else.

Now, let me illustrate to the Senator from New Hampshire what I think would be general legislation in this respect as contradistinguished from this, which is clearly to my mind special legislation.

If we should enact here that no camp site shall be hereafter selected that does not have a clear, running stream of water through it, that would be general legislation, because applicable to all camp sites. It would be a part of the law of the whole country. It would apply to every object in that class, to every camp site we might have, whether we had two camp sites or four camp sites or forty camp sites or forty-five, one for each State. That would be a general provision of law.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish the Senator would repeat that observation.

Mr. FORAKER. The observation I made was this: If we were to provide in this legislation, instead of providing for the purchase of four camp sites, that any camp sites that might hereafter be purchased should be so located as that there should be running streams of water going through them, for sanitary purposes, for instance—that would be a general rule that would be applicable to all camp sites, and that would be general legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says, if he will permit me, "any camp sites to be hereafter located." Does he mean to say that if the provision in this bill relating to these four camp sites had provided that they should be sanitary, then it would be general legislation; and that it is not general legislation without such a provision?

Mr. FORAKER. That is not the case we have now before us. It has no reference whatever to the question we have under consideration, but a provision applying alike to all the members of a class would be general and not special. That is what I said. We have here, Mr. President, a question of whether or not the Secretary of War shall be authorized to use a certain amount of money named to purchase four designated camp sites that have been selected. The point is that that is not general legislation affecting the whole country, except in the sense that it is paid for out of the public Treasury; but all special and private pension bills are paid for out of the Treasury. That is not the test.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but what attracted my attention was that the Senator suggested, as I understood, that if we had provided that there should be a stream of running water through the camp, it would be general legislation. I repeat, does the Senator mean to say that if in this amendment it was provided that these camp sites should be placed on ground that was sanitary, it would be general legislation, and that it is not general legislation without that provision?

Mr. FORAKER. If it were a general provision it would be general legislation, but if it were to provide sanitation and had reference to only a particular site or a particular number of designated sites it would not be general legislation, but would be special legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do I understand the Senator to say that if this bill provided for forty-five different camp sites it would be general legislation?

Mr. FORAKER. Did I say that?

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought so.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not say that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought the Senator said if the amendment applied to all the sites it would be general legislation.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I did not say that. What I said was that if we were to enact a general provision that should be applicable to all camp sites that we might hereafter purchase, whether two or four or forty or forty-five in number, one for each State, that particular provision applicable to all alike would be general legislation; but so long as you legislate about a specific thing or a specific number of designated things, if you legislate specifically about localities or about individual things, it is special legislation, and not general legislation, no matter what the number may be, so long as that number does not embrace a whole class.

But I shall read a little further——

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says that if we put in a general bill——

Mr. BLACKBURN. We are unable on this side to hear what is being said.

Mr. FORAKER. I can not myself hear the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says if we should put in a provision that there should be a camp site in every State that would be general legislation.

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President; the Senator did not say any such thing.

Mr. HALE. Then what did the Senator say?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I object to interruptions that are not made in good faith, and it impresses me that this one is not made in good faith.

Mr. HALE. It is not for the Senator to say whether an interruption is made in good faith.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator who is interrupted has a right to judge whether or not an interruption is made in good faith.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will be good-natured about it.

Mr. FORAKER. "The Senator" is good-natured; but twice now I have responded to this same kind of interruption, and both times in the presence of the Senator from Maine, who is quick to understand, for no man is more acute.

Mr. HALE. The Senator must not assume because I propound an uncomfortable question that it is not propounded in good faith.

Mr. FORAKER. There is nothing uncomfortable in the question which the Senator from Maine propounds, though he is as well qualified to propound uncomfortable questions as any Senator in this body; but he has not done so in this instance.

Mr. HALE. The Senator must not judge. When I propound an interrogatory to him, he must not say that I am not propounding that interrogatory to him in good faith.

Mr. FORAKER. What I object to is not the Senator's interruption, but the Senator's misrepresentation—not intentional, I suppose, but misrepresentation nevertheless—of what I had said.

Mr. HALE. I certainly so understood the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. And following immediately after the correction of a similar misrepresentation I did not think it had been made in good faith. I generally say what I think, and I always think what I say.

Mr. HALE. I certainly understood the Senator to say that anything in the bill that applied to sanitation would be general legislation.

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President, I did not. What I said was this——

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me good-naturedly—and I would not think of having a colloquy with him in any other than a good-natured humor—what I said was this: That if we were to make a general provision applicable to all camp sites that we may have or may hereafter procure, whether the number were two or four or forty or forty-five—one for each State—that general provision would be general legislation.

I did not say that to procure forty-five camp sites, one for each State, would be general legislation; but what I said was that a provision for particular sanitary conditions for all of our camp sites and applicable to all that belong to that class would be general legislation, and not special.

Now, I do not wish to be diverted from reading these authorities. I have got into a discussion here that I feel no personal interest in whatever, so far as these camp sites are concerned, though I feel a good deal of interest in it as a member of this body: for if we are to be told that an appropriation to buy four specified camp sites is general legislation, and if that becomes the law of this body, it is a pretty important ruling and one that I protest against. But now allow me to cite some authorities.

I read from Bouvier's Law Dictionary. There is no end of authorities on this subject:

> General laws.—Laws which apply to and operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things, requiring legislation peculiar to themselves in the matters covered by the laws are general laws.
> Statutes which relate to persons and things as a class (77 Pa., 348). Laws that are framed in general terms, restricted to no locality and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purpose of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them class by themselves (40 N. J. L., 123).

So I might go on to read at very great length; but I have read enough to show what the rule is. No one can cite any authority that criticises that rule or controverts that rule as the authorities lay it down.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator to claim that this provision is in order on account of what is contained in section 35 of the act of 1901?

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. ALLISON. Or does he claim that on an appropriation bill, without any reference whatever to prior legislation, we have a right to provide for these camp sites?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, as the Senator was out of the Chamber for a time, I will repeat for his benefit that I am not discussing any feature of this point of order, excepting only the one question raised by it, whether or not this amendment is general legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand.

Mr. FORAKER. And I have distinguished this amendment from the clauses which have already gone out on this same point of order relating to the Medical and Ordnance Corps by showing that those sections were intended to become a part of the general statute, while this is not part of any general law.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand, then, the Senator bases his justification of this amendment on the ground that if we choose here to provide for purchasing camp sites wholly aside from section 35 of the law of 1901, we may do so.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no; not at all, Mr. President. That point has been considered by others who have spoken.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Then the Senator does not lay any stress on that.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]—I do not know whether the Senator from Iowa was out of the Chamber at the time—called attention to the fact that this amendment was not subject to the point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], because it was legislation to carry into effect a provision which had been made in an existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask the Senator another question, if he will allow me.

Mr. FORAKER. With pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose, instead of providing here for four camp sites, as section 35 of the act of 1901 contemplates, we should put in a provision for twenty camp sites, would that still be in order?

Mr. FORAKER. If you were to designate those twenty sites as you have designated these four, it would still be special legislation, and it would not make any difference that there was a larger number so long as the provision did not embrace all the members of the class.

Mr. ALLISON. And it would still be in order, does the Senator contend?

Mr. FORAKER. It would certainly be special legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. That is to say, suppose this point of order is not sustained, then it would be in order, would it, for the Senator from Kentucky, who seems to be interested in behalf of his State in the West Point, Ky., location, to move to add that, so as to make another camp site? Would that be in order?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; it would be if he did it in a specific way, as is done here. The distinction is so broad and is so perfectly plain that I wonder anybody can even appear to fail to see it, understand it, and appreciate it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], this amendment would be in order if there had been no previous legislation of any kind upon the subject. That must be so from his statement.

Mr. FORAKER. It would be, so far as the question of general legislation is concerned, on that particular question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not discussing that point.

Mr. FORAKER. I say that is the only one I am discussing. This is another point of order altogether. As I said in the beginning, I did not propose to address myself to that, for I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] well answered all that was said in that respect. It does not depend upon the number of things that are to be affected by an act of legislation, so long as we do not affect all of that particular class to which the number designated belongs.

As for instance, to go back to what I was talking about a moment ago when the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] interrupted me, if we were to authorize the Secretary of War to proceed to make surveys and examinations and contracts for the purchase of camp sites in such number as he might see fit, exercising his judgment as to their necessity for the military service or the necessities for properly drilling and disciplining the National Guard, and direct how he should be governed in discharging that duty, that would be general legislation. But we have got to take the case as it is, and when we provide by act of Congress that there shall be a hospital building—to use an illustration employed by the Senator from Wisconsin—erected in the city of St. Louis, on a particular piece of ground that is designated and described in the bill, at a cost not exceeding a certain amount, for which there has been an estimate made, that is not general legislation. That does not affect all the hospitals in the country. That does not affect all of the country. That affects only one particular transaction. It is one hospital out of the whole class of hospitals that the Government may see fit to provide. And that is special legislation. It is not general legislation.

So, as we frequently do in our State when we have occasion to legislate for one particular city, we can not do it under our constitution, which requires legislation of a certain kind to be by general law, except we so frame it as to make that legislation apply to all the cities of that particular class.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. FORAKER. If you make it applicable to only one, whether it be by name or description, it will be held to be special legislation—special legislation because it refers to only one member of a class instead of to all the members of the class. That is the rule, and whether it be applied to municipalities, or to individuals, or to hospitals, or to localities, or what not.

We have every day an illustration—if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me for just a moment further—in the legislation that is brought in here from the Committee on Pensions and in the legislation brought in here from the Committee on Military Affairs, and we have had within the last week or two an illustration of the difference between general law and special law. I refer to the fact that we have bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs removing the charge of desertion from the record of John Jones or doing something else for some particular individual in the way of relief. That is special legislation.

Special legislation may be either public or private. That is another classification which it is not necessary for me to go into. But when we bring in a bill, as we did the other day, from the Committee on Military Affairs, providing that all officers of the Army who have served a certain period of time mentioned in the bill shall, upon retirement, on certain terms and conditions, have given to them an additional rank—be given a promotion with which to retire—making it applicable to all of the class prescribed—that is general legislation. Is not that perfectly simple? The increased expense consequent upon that increased rank is to be paid for out of the common Treasury of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make an observation——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FORAKER. Whether it be in a special class or in the general class, the fact that it is paid out of the Treasury cuts no figure in determining whether it belongs to one class or another.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has expressed astonishment that any of us differ with the view he takes. I confess I have been very much troubled over Rule XVI of the Senate and have wondered that it has not been made more explicit, but I can not subscribe to the Senator's view, and I want to ask the Senator this question: Supposing when the post-office appropriation bill was under consideration I had offered an amendment providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Dover, N. H., and it had been ruled that it was relevant to the bill, would the Senator hold that that would not go out on a point made that it was general legislation?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I would. That is special legislation; that does not refer to a class. It would be public, but special.

Mr. GALLINGER. The difference is so wide between the Senator's view and mine that of course it can not possibly be reconciled, but very likely the Senator may be right.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, there must be some fundamental rule determining whether certain legislation is special or general. I have undertaken to point out what the rule is. Is there any doubt or uncertainty in the language I have read from the books? There is no criticism of that language upon the part of anybody.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought, Mr. President, that it sustained our position.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, Mr. President, how can the Senator say that he thinks it sustains his position when the language I have read is that the difference between special legislation and general legislation is that general legislation applies to the whole country, or to all the objects that belong to a class or to all the persons that belong to a class, and that nothing is general legislation that does not apply to all the objects of a class, and that everything is special legislation, whether it be public or private—and it is not now necessary to discuss that—that applies to a less number than all the numbers of a certain class.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the same question which I asked the Senator from Wisconsin; that is, whether he thinks an amendment to this provision authorizing the purchase of sites as drill grounds for the Naval Reserve in certain designated States and under certain designated conditions would be in order?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if you were to add to this amendment a provision that a certain designated piece of land should be purchased, and appropriating one hundred thousand or five hundred thousand dollars for it, directing the purchase of it, no matter what the particular purpose might be, it would not be general legislation. That would be special legislation.

That would not be a law for the whole country. That would not affect anybody or anything except only the public Treasury, out of which it must be paid—which, as we have seen, does not determine whether it is special or general, and the particular spot or locality that is to be purchased.

Mr. President, I do not want to pursue this matter any further. As I have said two or three times, I have no special interest in it. I do not care anything about the camp sites, except only in a general way. I have favored the policy of making some provision for the proper gathering together, drilling, and disciplining of our National Guard.

I favored the law that is referred to in this amendment when it was enacted; I voted for it in the committee, and I voted for it here in the Senate, and I participated in the debate in support of it to a limited extent, as I now remember. My interest is, as I have said, not on account of what we are proposing to do, but simply on account of the ruling that the Chair is asked to make.

This is wholly unlike the amendments in regard to the Medical Corps and the Ordnance Corps for reasons I need not repeat. Those were amendments to the general law which were to become a part of the general law of the whole country. They provided for the organization, conduct, and government of recognized and established departments of the military branch of the Government.

Mr. QUARLES. And control the entire class.

Mr. FORAKER. And control the entire class. They provide what the rank of the officers at the head of each of these departments shall be, how many officers there shall be of the different ranks mentioned, and who shall serve in these respective departments. It is a general law in every sense of the word, while the amendment in regard to the camp sites is wholly and absolutely different. This amendment simply says certain camps, describing them, having been selected and the price having been fixed, we hereby authorize the Secretary of War to go and purchase them.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. What would be the difference between this amendment and one which proposed to provide 100 additional acres of land for the West Point Military Academy?

Mr. FORAKER. There would not be a bit of difference.

Mr. FULTON. Would that not be general legislation?

Mr. FORAKER. No. If you were simply providing by law that somebody might go and select 100 acres of land under certain conditions, that might be a general law, because it would apply generally, but if you should designate and describe 100 acres of land at West Point and authorize an appropriation and direct somebody to go and make the purchase, that would be purely and simply special legislation. There is no question about that.

Mr. FULTON. Would that not be for the use of the entire country?

Mr. FORAKER. What it may be for the use of, Mr. President, is not the test, as I understand it.

Mr. FULTON. Would it not be for general use?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly it would be for general use.

Mr. FULTON. And if it is for general use, would it not be general legislation?

Mr. FORAKER. It is not the use to which a purchase may be subjected, as I understand it, that determines whether it is special or whether it is general. If you provide——

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] allow me to suggest to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] that that would not be for general use? It would be for the use of a particular class, and not for general use; it would be for the use of the people who are sent to that training school.

Mr. FULTON Yes; for the general benefit of the whole country.

Mr. QUARLES. No.

Mr. FULTON. Take it in the States, for instance. A law which provides for the incorporation of a particular locality is termed a special law, because it is one for the use and benefit of that particular locality. But suppose you propose to erect a public building for the use of the entire State, everyone will admit that is a public statute, a public law, a general law.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator will allow me to remind him that there are different classifications than those of special and general laws. There is another classification of public and private statutes. I have already referred to it, but I have not discussed it. A statute to authorize the building of a hospital would be a public statute, because it is to serve a public use, but it would not be a general statute.

Mr. FULTON. That is correct so far as a public statute is concerned. I did not intend to use it with that meaning. I say a law providing for the erection of a building for the use of the entire country, for a State building, or a Government building is a general law.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, may I ask the Senator from Oregon a question in regard to the statement he has just made?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; but I want to get through.

Mr. HOAR. If legislation providing for the building and establishing of hospitals and public buildings be general legislation——

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is impossible on this side of the Chamber to hear the discussion.

Mr. HOAR. If it be said that a provision for a new building because it is for the use of the General Government is general legislation, the purchasing of a new mail bag at a cost of $3 would be general legislation. There is not much difference.

Mr. FULTON. I do not think there is any difference, for the purchasing of supplies can be limited to one mail bag or a thousand. I do not think the number makes any difference. If you are purchasing for the use of the people, for the general use, for the use of the Government, it is general legislation. If it is general in its purpose and use, it is general legislation, because it is not confined to any locality, or to any individual in its use.

Mr. FORAKER. We have been talking about hospitals and about public buildings generally. Let us take another very familiar illustration—that of a bridge. Would anybody pretend to say that an act of the legislature authorizing the construction and maintenance of a bridge over a designated stream in a particular State would be a general law?

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. FORAKER. It would be for public use and a public statute, but it would not be a general law.

Mr. FULTON. It is not for the use of this Government. If we authorize the construction of a bridge in a particular State, we give the State in that locality the right to build that bridge for the use of the State. We consent to it because we have control of the public waters; but it is not for the general use of the Government.

Suppose you build a military bridge for the use of the Government, for the use of the Army; then it becomes a general matter and it is general legislation.

Mr. QUARLES. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me a moment, I think the Senator from Oregon is hoist by his own petard. He has given an illustration of the purchase of additional acres for the use of the Military Academy. That is not for the use of the people of the United States; it is a restricted use; it is a facility for a particular class—namely, those few chosen ones who go to that academy. It is fenced in with those grounds. It it not for general use. The public can not use it; it is used by a class.

Mr. FULTON. I will not further take the time of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very thankful to the Senator from Oregon for having interrupted me. I know he only wanted to get the right of it, and that is all I want. I have no interest in the legislation that is proposed, but I have the interest that every other Senator ought to have in the ruling that is to be made, and we ought to settle, and settle it right, what is meant by general legislation.

The Senator has put a number of illustrations. He speaks about legislation for a public building. That, Mr. President, gives rise to another classification entirely, to which I have already referred. But I repeat that there are special statutes that are public in their nature.

A statute authorizing a bridge across a river is a statute authorizing a public convenience, and it is therefore a statute that the courts will take judicial notice of, because it is public in its nature; but an act authorizing John Jones to receive $6 per month pension is special and also purely private. It is private and special, while a bridge statute is public and special. The courts will not take judicial notice of a bill relieving a man from the charge of desertion or to correct his military record. Neither will they take any notice of a statute granting an individual pension, because it is purely private, although the expense which it occasions is paid out of the public Treasury.

You must plead it whenever you want a court to take notice of it. But if you provide that all soldiers suffering a certain described disability shall have a certain named pension, that will be a public and also a general law of which the courts will take judicial notice.

Mr. HALE. I was about to suggest to the Senator that the President pro tempore of the Senate has indicated—and he was undoubtedly correct—that the first question to be submitted to the Senate is the question whether the amendment is germane.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And I suggest to the Senator—I do not want to interrupt his remarks—that in the order of our business the other point, as to whether it is general legislation, will come up afterwards. Is it not better to have these points settled in the order in which they come?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think we should have the question of general legislation settled first.

Mr. FORAKER. That is probably true. I have not had anything to do with arranging the order of this debate—I took it up just as it was brought before the Senate; but if we were to now pay much attention to the order in which we do things, it would be about the first time we have ever done that since I have been a member of this body. We do things usually just as they come up.

Mr. QUARLES. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. Would not the rule contended for here, that the procurement of a facility for a class is general legislation, if it were held to be the established rule, cripple every appropriation committee of this body?

Mr. FORAKER. It would make it absolutely impossible to amend any appropriation bill with any provision of this nature; clearly so.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. FORAKER. I might agree, and perhaps will—though I do not think I shall—as to the impolicy of making this appropriation. I have not considered that at all. But I am not going to agree, for the sake of killing something that may be objectionable in itself, to the establishment of a rule or to the making of a ruling which is going to plague us hereafter every time we undertake to legislate. I do not generally have much respect for points of order, anyway. They are always aimed at meritorious legislation that can not be defeated in any other way. I believe a parliamentary body should be fairly free to do as it sees fit and not be hedged about with a lot of fine points that somebody who studies points rather than the general good is always ready to make.

But I do not wish to detain the Senate any longer. I have tried to make it plain that in my opinion this is purely special legislation. It will be, however, legislation of a public character, because it relates to a public use and is to be paid for out of public funds. It is public legislation of which the courts will take judicial notice. But it is not general legislation, because it does not refer to all the members of a class nor to the whole country; and those are the absolute requisites of a general statute.

Mr. BLACKBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator object to the submission to the Senate of the question whether the amendment is germane? Then this other matter——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The other matter has been argued, I will say to the Senator from Maine, for the last two or three hours. If you are going to submit the relevancy question to the Senate, and it should be decided in a certain way, that would be the end of the argument. So it seems to me that as the debate has already taken so wide a course we had better finish it before the Senate votes.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. KEAN in the chair). But the Chair recognized the last point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], which was that the amendment is not germane, and that, in the judgment of the Senator from Maine, is the first question to be settled by the Senate.

Mr. MCCREARY. But the senior Senator from Kentucky desires to be heard on that subject and on other branches of the case.

Mr. FRYE. I should not think any Senator would wish to be heard on the question whether or not the amendment is germane.

Mr. MCCREARY. I think it is not germane.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It may be that the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate agrees with some of the rest of us that there is no room for a difference of opinion on the question of its relevancy.

Mr. FRYE. I do not think there is.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not think so either.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the matter submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, I object; because this debate has not been confined to either of the propositions involved in the point of order, but, as every Senator knows, it has covered both. Not a Senator has been heard who has not argued both the question as to its relevancy and as to whether it is general legislation.

Mr. FRYE. But what would the Senator say if the junior Senator from Maine should now take the chair and submit to the Senate the question whether or not this is germane?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Under the rule, that question the Chair has to submit to the Senate, and I would expect the junior Senator from Maine on the call of the roll to vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE. He would undoubtedly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure he would.

Mr. President, the truth is that a good many years ago the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate and I served together on the Committee on Rules in the House, and since that time we have served together on the Committee on Rules in the Senate, at one time when I was chairman of the Committee on Rules. So during an acquaintance covering a period of thirty years almost, I have known by close contact that the junior Senator from Maine was too good a parliamentarian to have a doubt in his mind as to the point of order that has been raised here.

Mr. President, in a Congressional experience——

Mr. FRYE. Is the Senator from Kentucky undertaking to bribe the Presiding Officer?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; on the contrary, I had the assurance of the distinguished Senator that I was correct before I expressed an opinion.

In a Congressional experience that is becoming somewhat lengthened and extended, I have never heard so plain a proposition discussed at such length or so elaborately as this has been.

There were three items inserted in this bill. It is not denied that this is an appropriation bill for the specific purpose of providing for the maintenance and support of the Military Academy of this Government, located at West Point. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has told you the position he took in that committee upon these amendments. So I have his example to follow when I tell you that I opposed in the committee this amendment known as the "camp-site amendment." There were two others—the one providing relief for the Medical Corps of the Army, the other providing relief for the Ordnance Corps of the Army. I cordially favored both of those amendments.

I believed that the Medical Corps and the Ordnance Corps needed the relief that those amendments, which have just been ruled out, attempted to give to them. I was opposed to the camp-site amendment, and I may subject myself to the criticism of the distinguished Senator from Texas, who has already taken occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that probably my colleague's opposition to the amendment was traceable to, or in some remote degree connected with, a failure upon the part of Kentucky to get a camp site included in this proposed legislation.

I may subject myself to a more severe ordeal and one more dreaded even than that presented by the Texas Senator as to my colleague, and that is that I may fall under the criticism of my facetious friend the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES], who has undertaken to criticise the Government's experience in its last fall's venture to have these maneuvers held upon a Kentucky camp site which is not included in the proposed amendment.

The Senator from Wisconsin tells us that the Government ought never to undertake to rent a camp site again; that it must buy the sites, and buy them now, because, he said, the frightful enormity of the bills that came in from Fort Riley and West Point last fall ought to deter the Government from ever undertaking to rent another camp site for army maneuvers.

When I asked him what the aggregate claims amounted to, he said the two together totaled about $8,000. If you will divide that by two and charge half of it up to the Kentucky camp site and the other half to the Kansas camp site, it is $4,000 each. There were 8,000 soldiers encamped at West Point in those maneuvers last fall, and the enormous, frightful costliness of the experiment in the way of claims for damages put into figures amounts to a half dollar per capita, according to the figures of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I opposed and voted against this camp-site amendment. It was pending as an original bill both in the Senate and in the other House. When it was taken up and put on as an amendment to the Military Academy bill, I said to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs that, while I favored both of the measures of relief for the Medical Corps and the Ordnance Corps, "A point of order will be made against all three of these items, and as surely as that point of order is made, it will be sustained, and all three will go out of this bill." I did not believe then, I never have believed, I do not believe now, that any ruling could be made except to sustain the point of order, as the Chair did do upon the Medical Corps amendment and as the Chair did do upon the Ordnance Corps amendment, and as it seems to me the Chair must do upon this camp-site amendment.

As to whether it be relevant or not, under the provision of one section of the sixteenth rule of the Senate that matter must be submitted to and be determined by a vote of the Senate. As to the question of its being general legislation, under another clause of the sixteenth rule it is the duty of the Chair to rule; and I have no doubt now as to what that ruling will be. I may not undertake to say what the result of the vote of the Senate will be upon the question of relevancy, but this I do want to say: It would be unfortunate for the reputation of the Senate, it would be more than unfortunate for the reputation of this body, if, after a point of order has been made on all three amendments, the one for the relief of the Medical Corps shall have fallen, and the one for the relief of the Ordnance Corps shall have followed it, and the one establishing these four camp sites shall work through. What will the public think? What will the world think of the method the Senate has of applying and executing its own rules?

Senators may differ, evidently from this debate Senators do differ, as to which of these three amendments is most obnoxious to the sixteenth rule that you have adopted for your government, but it seems to me there can be no difference of opinion among us on that question.

This is a bill to maintain the Military Academy, and for no other purpose, and yet it seems to me to be far more reasonable that you should put upon it a proviso that looks to the management of or to the relief that is sought by one of the corps of the Army than to undertake to go into the open market for the purchase of land in order to select and provide for army-camp sites from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

The amount of money involved should cut no figure in disposing of the point of order; and yet the Senate will not fail to remember that this very amendment which is now under debate on this point of order carries as an initiative a little over two millions of money that is to buy the land.

You do not know, nor do I, nor can any man tell what amount of money is involved in the adoption of this amendment. These two millions and more of dollars are simply to buy the naked land. Nine hundred thousand dollars of it goes to buy a site in the State of Pennsylvania. Will you undertake to tell me, and have you any authority for saying it, it will not cost more than $9,000,000 to improve the Pennsylvania camp site which you are going to buy for $900,000? Five hundred thousand dollars of it goes to buy a site in the State of Wisconsin. Will either of the Senators from that great State give us their assurance that it will not cost this Government more than $5,000,000 before the Government gets through completing the equipment of the site they favor? Five or six hundred thousand dollars of it goes to the State of California to buy a lot of naked land. Will the Senators from California answer and obligate themselves to protect the Government against the expenditure of ten or twelve million dollars of money for the completion of that site after its purchase? So with all of them.

This amendment carries $125,000 to purchase a site in the State of Texas, and then it carries an appropriation of $100,000 to add to the holding at the camp site in Chickamauga. So you have about $2,100,000 of an initiative expenditure. And whilst it may be conceded that it is all guesswork, I apprehend that no Senator here would be prepared to deny, or warranted in denying, the guess of twenty-five or thirty million dollars before you get through if you should adopt the amendment that is here objected to.

I did not make any point of order against this amendment. I had hoped that the other two amendments might go through without a point of order being made, and as I felt that way toward those two amendments it did not become me to enter the point of order against the camp-site amendment. I am not only a member of the committee that reported the bill, but I am one of the subcommitteemen who stand here tendering it to the Senate. But I can not doubt, I do not doubt, that the Chair did right when he sustained the point of order against the other two amendments, and I am sure he will do right if he sustains the point of order against this amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I can not expect and do not expect to add anything to what has been said by the Senators from Wisconsin and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] on the points which they discussed in reference to the point of order. There is, however, one phase of this matter to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair, of which, so far as I recollect, and so far as occurred in my presence, no mention has been made this afternoon.

The point of order, as I understand it, is that this section of the bill relating to camp sites is general legislation, and consequently obnoxious to the third subdivision of Rule XVI of the Senate.

In the discussion of the Indian appropriation bill some ten days or two weeks ago the President of the Senate laid down what in my judgment is the best rule I have heard as to what is general legislation within the meaning of this rule of the Senate, and that was this: That any legislation on an appropriation bill which continues in force after the appropriation bill itself has died is general legislation, and that any provision of an appropriation bill carrying an appropriation which becomes functus officio after the expiration of the time the appropriation bill is operative is not general legislation.

Mr. President, what does that mean? It means that if there is any general provision on an appropriation bill which continues operative and effective after the appropriation bill shall have expired by limitation, or, to put it differently, any provision for the regulation of the Government or its officials which remains in force after the appropriation bill itself becomes functus officio is general legislation within the meaning of this rule, and therefore obnoxious to it.

In passing, I may say that this provision with reference to the camp sites is neither more nor less than an appropriation to carry into effect section 35 of the act of February 2, 1901. That phase of it has been fully discussed by Senators who have heretofore spoken. In addition to that, it will be observed that the provision to which objection is made does no more than make an appropriation for the purchase of these sites, and after the purchase is made—and it must be made within the next fiscal year or not at all—then the provision ceases to be effective, ceases to be operative, and is not general legislation regulating the conduct of the officials of the Government thereafter.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why does the Senator say the purchase must be made this year?

Mr. CULBERSON. Because the appropriation is limited to the fiscal year.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. CULBERSON. I so understand it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. CULBERSON. It certainly dies with the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. CULBERSON. Suppose that to be the case——

Mr. QUARLES. If the Senator will permit me, to phrase it a little differently, after the purchase of the sites this amendment lays down no rule of action to control anybody. It is at an end.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly. But I was going to add, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that this provision of the bill, in the language of the President pro tempore of the Senate in the case of the Indian appropriation bill, dies with this bill itself and does not remain on the statute books as a general regulation.

In the case to which I referred there was a provision in the Indian bill changing an agreement for a treaty with reference to certain Indians, carrying an appropriation of a million dollars, and the President of the Senate held that that was not general legislation within the meaning of this rule, notwithstanding it amended a statute of the United States, because the appropriation died with the bill.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] insists that this provision which we are now considering ought not to be held to come within the rule because the amendments with reference to the Medical and Ordnance Corps have been stricken out.

But, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Ohio, they are entirely distinct, those regulating the Ordnance and Medical Departments remaining upon the general statutes of the country, containing regulations for the future, and this one expiring with this bill; if not in the fiscal year, certainly in two years.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. This amendment in the eighth and ninth lines, on page 31, says:

> For the instruction and maneuvering of troops of the Regular Army and National Guard.

Is that to end this year?

Mr. CULBERSON. The purpose of that, and that is what makes it germane to this bill, it seems to me, is to provide a camp of instruction to be used in connection with the Military Academy after these officers shall have graduated and ceased to be members of the corps of cadets at the Military Academy. It does not matter what ulterior or indefinite effect certain provisions of this proposed law may have, nor what use is to be made of the property, because that is to be regulated hereafter by Congress, and the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island is answered by the proviso at the end of the bill:

> That no permanent military post shall be established, or any steps taken looking toward the establishment of a post, on any of the camps hereby authorized to be purchased without express authority of Congress.

That shows that this is a mere temporary provision, which dies with the bill, and that the further use of these camps, their further regulation, is to be determined hereafter by Congress.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think these camp sites will be on the Government's hands at the end of the year?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly, they will be on the Government's hands just like any other property that the Government may purchase.

Mr. HALE. And will be our property.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. But there is no regulation.

Mr. HALE. The question of regulation is not the main thing. They will be our property.

Mr. QUARLES. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And if it is not general legislation to increase the property of the Government in this way all over the country, then I can not see what is general legislation.

Mr. CULBERSON. In answer to the Senator from Maine, I will say that this is nothing except a specific appropriation in an appropriation bill to buy property which shall hereafter be used as camps of instruction in general connection with military instruction at the Academy, as may hereafter be determined by Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. Camps all over the United States?

Mr. CULBERSON. It goes no further than what I have suggested. After the purchase of the property during the life of this bill the provision is no longer effective. I simply want to invite attention to this particular phase of the question, to which heretofore allusion has not been made.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, let us have the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits to the Senate the question of the relevancy of the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The question is whether it is germane to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. QUARLES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present. The question before the Senate is whether this amendment is germane to the appropriation bill. Senators in favor of holding that it is germane will say "aye," opposed "no." [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. QUARLES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators holding that the amendment is germane will say "yea" as their names are called. Those holding that it is not germane will say "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. As he is not in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which I will transfer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS]. I vote "nay."

Mr. KEARNS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. FOSTER]. I do not see that Senator in the Chamber, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MILLARD (when his name was called). As the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], with whom I am paired, is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is necessarily absent.

Mr. BATE. I do not know how my colleague would vote on this question.

Mr. SPOONER. I have conversed with the Senator's colleague as to his attitude, and I do not feel at liberty to vote. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUARLES. I can inform my colleague that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] favors the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. On that statement I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BAILEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted, but I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and, observing that he is not in the Chamber, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CLAY. I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is declared not germane. Are there further amendments?

Mr. WARREN. The committee have no further amendments to offer.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming relative to the amendment on page 24, at line 16.

Mr. WARREN. What is the inquiry of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. MALLORY. I see that the amendment there provides a school for children, and I observe by the report that there are some 250 children there. I should like to inquire of the Senator what children they are and what they are doing there?

Mr. WARREN. They are the children of the officers and men of the Army and of the civilian appointees and employees at West Point.

Mr. MALLORY. They are not in any way connected with the Academy, I understand. I should like to inquire of the Senator if there is any precedent for it?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that there is only one regular United States Military Academy—the one at West Point—so that necessarily there could be no precedent.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not imagine that that is the only locality in the country where the Government has exclusive jurisdiction. There are probably military reservations and military posts where there are as great a number of children as at West Point. I am in favor of the amendment. I should like to know if there is any precedent for it.

Mr. WARREN. As I remarked before, there can be no precedent, because the difference in the condition at West Point and of Government ownership and jurisdiction at the various military posts is that at West Point there are those employed year after year for almost a lifetime perhaps, and their children have not convenient access to schools outside the reservation. It has seemed to your committee that with the great military school there for the education of officers of the Army we can hardly afford to neglect the children and provide no means for them to obtain a common school education.

Mr. MALLORY. It is a fact that those children have no other means of obtaining an education, unless the Government provides for it. I have a case exactly similar in my State, and I propose hereafter to cite this as a precedent.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14826) to amend the homestead laws as to certain unappropriated and unreserved lands in Nebraska.

The message also announced that the House further insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 2134) to connect Euclid place with Erie street, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BABCOCK, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, and Mr. MEYER of Louisiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 12833) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate No. 50, 51, 52, and 174 to the bill, upon which the committee of conference had been unable to agree, and agrees to the same.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 67) providing for the printing of Senate Document No. 240, relating to the beet-sugar industry in the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 150) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 4570) to provide an American Register for the steamer Beaumont; and

A bill (H. R. 12220) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

SPUYTEN DUYVIL CREEK AND HARLEM RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BACON and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. DEPEW. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me? I want to have a purely local bill passed.

Mr. BACON. If I have the right to do so, I will not object to the Senator calling up his bill, provided it does not occupy any time in the way of debate or discussion of any kind.

Mr. DEPEW. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4713) to authorize the Spuyten Duyvil and Port Morris Railroad Company and its lessee, the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, to build and maintain bridges or other structures for their railroad across the Spuyten Duyvil Creek and the Harlem River north of the Harlem River pier and bulkhead lines as now established in the city of New York.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

In section 1, page 2, line 7, after the word "bridges," to strike out:

Or such other fixed structures as may be required or convenient for the passage of railway trains and other railroad equipment thereon.

And insert:

That over the Spuyten Duyvil Creek to have a clear span of not less than 200 feet and to have a clearance above mean high water of not less than 8 feet 8 inches, and that over the Harlem River to have a clear span of not less than 25 feet and to have a clearance above mean high water of not less than 4 feet 8 inches.

In line 16, after the word "bridges," to strike out "or other structures;" in line 23, after the word "bridge," to strike out "or other fixed structure;" on page 3, line 8, after the word "bridge," to strike out "or other fixed structure;" and on the same page, line 16, after the words "Kings Bridge," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That when consents thereto shall have been executed in manner aforesaid, by each and all of the owners of land, or interest therein, bordering upon the portion of the Spuyten Duyvil Creek and the Harlem River, respectively, northerly of the Harlem River pier and bulkhead lines, as now established, the said railroad companies, or either thereof, may build, maintain, and use for their said corporate purposes, in lieu of the said fixed bridges, any such fixed structures as the said consents may designate.

So as to make the section read:

That it shall be lawful for the Spuyten Duyvil and Port Morris Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, and the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, the lessee of the railroad of the said the Spuyten Duyvil and Port Morris Railroad Company, to build and maintain upon, over, and across the land underlying and constituting the bed of the Harlem River and the Spuyten Duyvil Creek, respectively, at such respective points as said corporations, or either thereof, may select, north of the Harlem River pier and bulkhead lines as now established, in the Borough of Manhattan and in the Borough of the Bronx, in the city of New York, fixed bridges, that over the Spuyten Duyvil Creek to have a clear span of not less than 20 feet and to have a clearance above mean high water of not less than 3 feet 8 inches, and that over the Harlem River to have a clear span of not less than 25 feet and to have a clearance above mean high water of not less than 4 feet 8 inches, and to lay over said bridges such number of railway tracks and other railroad appliances as the said corporations or either of them may deem their convenience to require for the more perfect connection and operation of any railroad or railroads that are or shall be constructed by them to the banks of the said river or the said creek: Provided, however, That as a condition precedent to the building of the said fixed bridge upon, over, and across the land underlying and constituting the bed of the Harlem River consents thereto in writing shall have been executed and acknowledged in the form required for conveyance of real estate in the State of New York by each and all of the owners of land or interest therein bordering upon that portion of the Harlem River between the northerly Harlem River pier and bulkhead lines as now established and the fixed bridge next northerly thereof and known as the Farmers Bridge; and that as a condition precedent to the building of the said fixed bridge upon, over, and across the land underlying and constituting the bed of the Spuyten Duyvil Creek consents thereto in manner and form above specified shall have been given by each and all of the owners of land or interest therein bordering upon that portion of the said Spuyten Duyvil Creek between the said northerly Harlem River pier and bulkhead lines and the fixed bridge next northerly thereof and known as Kings Bridge: Provided further, That when consents thereto shall have been executed in manner aforesaid, by each and all of the owners of land, or interest therein, bordering upon the portion of the Spuyten Duyvil Creek and the Harlem River, respectively, northerly of the Harlem River pier and bulkhead lines, as now established, the said railroad companies, or either thereof, may build, maintain, and use for their said corporate purposes, in lieu of the said fixed bridges, any such fixed structures as the said consents may designate.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BACON. I would be very glad to do so, but it is manifest that every Senator in the Chamber has some particular matter to dispose of. If I yield to one I shall be compelled to yield to all.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield my hope of getting the floor, if the Senator will proceed with his speech.

Mr. BACON. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. CULLOM. I say I will give up my chance of trying to get the floor to pass a bill, which I am anxious to do; but I know the Senator has to speak to-night, if at all, probably, and I hope he will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor. He yielded the floor yesterday afternoon with the understanding that he would resume it at the first opportunity.

Mr. BACON. I hope no Senator will consider me discourteous, but it is evident that the desire is not confined to one or two Senators, but Senators all over the Chamber and immediately in my neighborhood are each one desirous of some indulgence at my hands, and if I yield to all it will be practically surrendering the opportunity to conclude my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Georgia to yield simply that I may make a statement occupying a moment.

I have on two or three different occasions suggested that I intended to move an executive session. It was my purpose to do so this afternoon, but I am hoping that we will meet to-morrow morning a little earlier than the usual hour. In that case I shall move an executive session when we come together to-morrow, and for the purpose of not interrupting the proceedings this afternoon, I will state that I will not make that motion to-day.

Mr. TELLER. I intend now to object to the taking up of any more bills at this time. I enter my objection. The Senator from Georgia has the floor, or if he has not somebody else ought to have it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is very embarrassing, of course, to me to refuse to yield to any request that is made by a Senator, and I hope Senators will not consider me as indifferent to their wishes in such regard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

TRUSTS AND PRICES OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. BACON resumed the speech begun by him yesterday. After having spoken nearly an hour,

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. ALLISON. For the convenience of Senators and for the necessary transaction of business it is necessary that when the Senate has finished the work of this afternoon it shall take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow. The House will take the same recess, for there it is necessary to have a day's notice before finally concluding the consideration of conference reports on appropriation bills.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa, for the convenience of the Senate, if it is the expectation that Congress will adjourn on the 28th?

Mr. ALLISON. It is the hope, not to say the expectation.

Mr. BAILEY. Hopes are frequently disappointed; expectations seldom, when they arise out of assurances from the Senator from Iowa and his committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I think so far as concerns the Committee on Appropriations and matters relating to appropriations the Senate will be prepared to adjourn on Thursday.

Mr. BAILEY. I think we can make our calculations in that way. As a matter of personal convenience I wanted to know.

Mr. ALLISON. We can not tell what may fall by the wayside in the meantime, but I should think that may be fairly presumed.

I move that at 6 o'clock p. m. the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa that at 6 o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

TRUSTS AND PRICES OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor on yesterday I was engaged in presenting to the Senate the evidences of the fact of the sales of goods by American producers in foreign countries at rates less than the producers sold to American consumers. I wish to add a little to that particular line of the presentation.

I find in the Iron Age, a publication made in New York, on page 6, a communication from London as to the sale of American products of iron in the markets of Great Britain:

LONDON, November 7, 1903.

From the American point of view the British metal market is now becoming exceedingly interesting. It is almost, if not quite, in a panicky condition, because of the fear of American competition. It is curious to observe that German competition during recent months has been taken with considerable equanimity, but American competition, in the mind of the British maker and consumer, is a horse of another color.

Undoubtedly one or two small contracts have been made on American account, but so far the volume does not amount to much. Yet the mere threat has gone some distance in disorganizing affairs. Rumors of large contracts made with the United States Steel Corporation and with other American concerns are now thick as leaves in Vallombrosa.

Prices have been quoted by the corporation agents for "sheet bars" at 80 shillings, c. i. f., Liverpool. This is 2 or 3 shillings below German rates, and, of course, much below the English.

I have been unable to get quotations of prices at which "sheet bars" are sold to consumers in the United States, but it will be noted that the American prices in England are much below the English prices, and there can be no doubt in that case that they are very much below the prices charged in America to American consumers.

In the same publication a dispatch from Glasgow is to the following effect:

GLASGOW, November 6, 1903.

There have been many quotations from your side for pig iron, steel bars, etc., delivered in Glasgow, but no transactions, as far as I can learn, have been actually booked here. The first sale of 1,000 tons of American steel bars at Swansea was known here, I think, before New York. Further sales have been made up to 80,000 tons, over next six months, of American steel bars, or billets, for South Wales and Lancashire.

I read those extracts mainly for the purpose of showing that the transactions are not of a minor character, nor such as would be found if these parties were simply endeavoring to introduce their products into the British market, or in cases where they were endeavoring to work off an undesirable surplus which was on hand.

In connection with the above and for the same purpose I quote the following from Representative BABCOCK, of Wisconsin, the chairman of the Republican national committee, which appeared in the Washington Post September 21, 1901:

One of the points which impressed me of the desirability of revising the steel schedule was information I obtained in Scotland of the placing of an order for 20,000 tons of American steel. When you stop to think that 20,000 tons of steel mean more than 1,000 carloads, it will not do to say that such an order placed abroad by our manufacturers is only their surplus product.

I wish to again call attention to the Raoul letter for the purpose of discussing one point that I did not yesterday call attention to. I then read the letter in full, and in order to attract attention to the particular point I now have in view, it is necessary for me to read again only one sentence. This, the Senate will remember, is the letter written to me by the president of the Mexican National Railway Company, in which he stated that there had been for a long number of years a distinction between export prices and domestic prices in his purchases, his railroad being located partly in Mexico and partly in the State of Texas, and that higher prices were charged for all purchases made by him as to articles intended for use on the railroad in Texas than as to those articles which were intended to be used in Mexico. In that letter there is this sentence:

For a long time past all our purchases have been made on the basis of export prices even though they have occasionally stopped in Texas, the competition being keen enough to produce this cut in prices in favor of the Texas shipments, so that it has been some time past since we have had any material differences, but those differences do exist and to an iniquitous extent.

The particular point I want to call attention to is this: Here was the president of a railroad located, as I have said, partly in Mexico and partly in Texas. The price for goods sold for consumption on that part of the railroad located in Mexico were recognized as export prices, which were lower than the prices of goods intended for consumption or use on that part of the railroad located in the State of Texas. The contention of those who defend the practice of selling goods for less in foreign countries than is asked for the same goods of the domestic consumers is that it is done for the purpose of introducing goods in the foreign market or for the purpose of working off a surplus, such as sometimes might be done by a merchant in selling at his bargain counter at less really than the goods were worth.

But in this particular case the statement of Mr. Raoul is that so anxious were these parties for the sale of the goods to him on the Mexican part of his railroad at the low export prices that on account of the competition to get that particular custom on the Mexican part of the road those parties would absolutely make the concession of giving the same low export prices on goods which were sold for use on the part of the road in Texas, showing that the trade of the Mexican National Railroad at the foreign prices was a valuable trade and not one entered into for the purpose of introducing goods, or for the purpose of working off a surplus, but one sought for upon the ground that it was a valuable trade, and, in order to secure that trade, they were absolutely ready to make the concession of the same low prices for the part of the railroad which was in Texas. If there is any Senator who can make any reply to that either now or in the future, I hope he will not fail to do so.

I gave yesterday certain statements as to particular instances which I denominated concrete. I have another instance to-day. This is information given me by a gentleman who has given his name and address, so that the matter can be verified if he has made any statement which is not entirely correct. The statement is made to me by Mr. William D. Lent. His address is Murray Hill Hotel, New York City. Mr. Lent is a retired merchant, formerly in the glass and paint business in the city of New York. His statement to me is that he was told within a year or so by a gentleman in the city of New York—who, by the way, is a Republican, and whose name Mr. Lent is ready to give to anyone, I presume, who will ask it of him; I do not mention it here for reasons that are sufficient—that this gentleman desired to purchase a sewing machine for his wife in the city of New York, and that he was asked $55 for it, but not being willing to pay that price he went to an export agent to see if he could make any arrangement through him by which he could get this machine at a less price. The export agent stated to him that he could do so, but that in order for him to get the benefit of the export price he, the export agent, would have to buy the machine and send it to a ship in the port, and then send it back to him from the ship, the purchase being made manifestly with the understanding that it was for the export trade. He stated that this was done, and when the machine and the bill were sent to him the bill was $18.

Mr. President, I have no personal knowledge of that, but I have given the name of the gentleman, so that if there is any desire for further inquiry about the matter it can be made.

Mr. BATE. So this man paid $18 for his machine instead of $55?

Mr. BACON. Yes; he paid $18 instead of $55.

It is possible that $55 was the retail price in New York, and that $18 was the wholesale export price. But as to this I have no information. But even if this is so, the very wide discrepancy in the two prices would indicate that even at wholesale prices the price to the domestic customer was at least twice as much, or more, as the price to the foreign customer across the water.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understand the Senator from Georgia does not know what the wholesale price of such a machine would be in New York.

Mr. BACON. I do not; but while I am not prepared to state what the wholesale price was, there is very little reason to doubt that the wholesale price was very far in excess of $18, at which this New York gentleman secured a machine, which was intended by the seller to be sent abroad for what was supposed to be a foreign customer.

Mr. President, I have one other concrete matter to present to the Senate, which is of more general interest even than those of sewing machines. In the Washington Post in 1902—I am not prepared to give the exact date; but of course that is definite enough for identification—there is found an editorial upon this general subject, in which is given a statement of what was said in an editorial in the Philadelphia Press. Everyone will recognize, of course, that the Philadelphia Press is one of the typical Republican newspapers of the United States, and that no statement to the effect that I am about to read would be made by that paper with any disposition to cast any reflection upon any protective feature of the present tariff law or upon its operation. This is what is stated by the Washington Post to be the statement made by the Philadelphia Press. It relates to the question of the price of butchers' meat to consumers in this country. It is as follows:

About the last source to which one would naturally look for an argument in favor of the reduction of any tariff schedule is the Philadelphia Press. In harmony with the Republican sentiment of Pennsylvania, the Press opposes tariff revision. In their recently adopted platform the Pennsylvania Republicans declare their "unswerving loyalty" to the Dingley tariff and set themselves squarely against any effort to revise it or to interfere in any way with its operations. They also "affirm the friendship of the Republican party for the breadwinner and the home builder."

To all this the Press heartily subscribes, seemingly unconscious that its party is going into the Congressional campaign under the management of an enthusiastic advocate of tariff revision, a revision that has for its central point the leading industry of Pennsylvania, which is protected by duties for which he declares there is no necessity and can be no defense.

But while the Press stands up bravely for the tariff as it is, although well knowing that some of its schedules were framed and adopted with a view to their cutting down almost immediately, the necessities of its position as a real newspaper compel it incidentally to condemn some of its provisions and their condemnation is an inferential protest against other schedules that produce similar results. Just as the free-trade organs condemn their theory by printing the statistics of our industries, our commerce, our national finances, and savings-banks deposits, so the organs of extreme protection, of protection gone mad, furnish convincing arguments against their policy simply by printing facts. For example, just before the Republican Congressional candidates go out on a campaign in which they will find it impossible either to dodge or defend the tariff on meat the Press shows the difference in meat prices between Buffalo and Fort Erie, directly opposite in Canada. It says the beef trust has advanced the prices in Buffalo from 25 to 50 per cent. Porterhouse steak, for instance, is 24 cents in Buffalo and 16 cents in Fort Erie; loin steak, 15 cents in the city which is forced to pay beef-trust prices and 12 cents in Fort Erie. The Press says that the cost of living has been increased by the trust, so far as meat is concerned, from 10 to 50 per cent, as these figures prove.

It did not occur to our Philadelphia contemporary to mention any reason why the beef trust is able to run up prices on this side of the line, while they remain in statu quo on the other side. But it is likely to occur to a good many millions of consumers, and especially to wage-workers, that the duty imposed on beef cattle and all kinds of dressed meat is what has caused important change in the contents of the "full dinner pail."

Mr. President, I have presented not only general statements, but the evidence of the particular instances, from which it will be seen that the facts exist, that to a very great degree the prices of manufactures in the United States—not only manufactures, I might say, but, as I have just read, provisions, such as beef and butchers' meat of all kinds, is sold at an enormously higher rate in the United States than the same articles are sold by the same parties to persons in foreign countries.

From this I think I am entitled to ask, "What does the dominant party propose to do in the presence of such a fact?" In the first place, there can be no question as to the right of the public to demand that this particular amendment shall be adopted and that the Department of Commerce and Labor shall be charged with the duty of making the investigation and of reporting to Congress, and thus to the public, to what extent this practice goes, in order that they may determine to what extent and in what particulars the protective tariff in its schedules is extortionate and an oppression to the people.

Whenever, Mr. President, anything is urged in the way of tariff reform, the reply is that the effort is to restore free trade. Instead of defending the particular schedules, the issue is immediately sought to be shifted to the question as to whether or not a protective tariff is the proper thing, or whether or not a revenue tariff should be preferred to it. In other words, the effort is to endeavor to avoid the issue as to whether there is in exorbitant rates an abuse even from the standpoint of the protective tariff system. Whenever there is an effort made to correct a tariff abuse the reply is an outcry of "Free trade!" or "Tariff for revenue!" as if every opponent of free trade or of tariff for revenue only must necessarily approve and defend every abuse and iniquity perpetrated in the name of a protective tariff.

I desire to say for myself, Mr. President, that I think the time has come when men of all parties—Democrats as well as Republicans—should look at this matter from a practical standpoint, and if, by the practical operation of the protective tariff, there has grown up an abuse as to particular schedules, and under that abuse an oppression of the people in the exaction of extortionate prices, then every effort should be made to correct these particular abuses in the most practical way in which the end can be accomplished. I am free to say that whatever may be, from an abstract standpoint, the preference of anyone on the subject of tariff rates, I do not expect to see a low tariff in this country, certainly within the near future or within many years, whichever party may be in power. I do not expect to see a low tariff for two reasons. In the first place, the necessities of the Government will not permit of a low tariff. The expenditures of the Government have grown to such an extent that, in order to realize the necessary revenue for the support of the Government, the tariff rate must necessarily be high. And while there has been much extravagance and the public expenditures far exceed what they should be, still the Government has grown to such an extent that even with the utmost economy the public expenditure would continue to be very great, and a very great revenue, even with such economy, will be necessary.

Another reason is that the business of the country has largely become adjusted to a high rate of tariff. The values of property of all kinds, of material, of services of all kinds, including salaries and wages, and all other values in the country are upon the scale resulting from the high tariff. And even if the opportunity were presented and there were not this necessity for a large revenue it would be impracticable without a dislocation and derangement of business, which could not be thought of or tolerated by the American people, to so change the tariff as to immediately reduce it from a very high tariff to a very low tariff.

But while I do not expect to see a low tariff, I do hope that we may see a reasonable tariff, one reasonable in rates and impartial in adjustment; and I do hope the attention of the country may be drawn to conditions, so that people, regardless of party affiliations and regardless of what may be their particular views as to the question of the policy of a protective tariff or the policy as to a revenue tariff, may recognize that there are abuses which should be corrected. The particular instances which I have endeavored to point out seem to me to furnish sufficient evidence of the existence of such abuses, and to furnish basis for the conclusion that similar abuses exist in many other instances under the present tariff law.

I recognize that so long as we limit ourselves to the advocacy of a tariff lower in scale of rate than the American people will approve, just so long will we fail to secure the cooperation and support which will enable us to correct these abuses and thus relieve the people of the extortions and burdens such as those of which I have spoken and under which they now suffer. Any tariff sufficiently high to raise the large revenue required to support the Government in its constantly increasing needs will, if judiciously and impartially laid and adjusted, furnish all the encouragement and protection, if you please, required by the industries of the country. It is the rate of the tariff which is the practical feature; and when this rate is sufficient for the demands of the country, it matters not whether it be called a protective tariff or a tariff for revenue. Its functions and effects at a given rate are the same, whether called by the one name or the other.

Many of the schedules of the present tariff law are too high, and are so recognized by many Republicans who are the most ardent advocates of protection as a tariff policy. Many of these schedules are not only "protection run mad," but are practically prohibitory of any importations under them, and in consequence prevent the Government from deriving any revenue through them. The steel schedule is an illustration. In the six years under the Dingley bill I have already shown that 12,686,434 tons of steel rails were consumed in the United States, and of this only 142,192 tons were imported. And while, if Mr. Schwab's figures are correct, the people of the United States have in six years paid to the steel producers of the United States more than $150,500,000 above a reasonable profit on the rails bought from them, the Government has during the same time received less than $1,200,000 of revenue from steel rails imported from other countries.

I have seen somewhere stated four classes of tariff advocates: First, those who favor tariff for revenue only without any protection; second, those who favor a revenue tariff with incidental protection; third, those who favor a tariff for protection with incidental revenue; and, fourth, those who favor a tariff for protection without any revenue. Many of the most burdensome and oppressive schedules in our present tariff law, those which take most money out of the pockets of the people, belong to the last class; for while at the expense of the people they thus enrich the protected classes, they pay no money in the way of revenues to the Government.

While I do not undertake to speak for protectionists, because I am myself not one, I think it is easily demonstrable that the doctrines of those who were the original founders of the protective policy are not those which are adhered to to-day by those who have the power to frame tariff laws.

The original ground upon which the protective tariff policy was founded was—or, rather, one of the grounds and one of the principal contentions was—that by reason of the protective policy the fostering of home industries would be such that a competition would arise among them which would reduce prices. That has been a favorite theory.

If I saw proper to consume the time in so doing, I could refer to unnumbered instances in which such contention has been made by leading Republicans. It so happens, Mr. President, that I have one recently made by a member of this Senate, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], which I will read, as expressing what I understand to be the fundamental principle of the Republican party and of those who adhere to the protectionist policy as the vindication of that policy. In a speech made at Akron, in Ohio, in 1902, the senior Senator from Ohio used this language:

> This does not mean that we are opposed to any kind of a change at any time in the tariff schedules and rates. On the contrary, we believe in tariff revision from time to time, as occasion may require, but it must always be on protection lines.
> At the very foundation of the protective policy has always been the idea and claim that it would multiply industries, improve facilities, develop competition, and ultimately reduce the cost of manufacture below their cost abroad.
>
> It has also always been a part of this policy to reduce high rates of duty deemed necessary to secure the establishment of an industry as rapidly as its development and the cheapening of its product might allow.
>
> The Republican party will not for light reasons disturb a law that has brought us such prosperity, but it will not hesitate when there is just occasion for doing so to make such amendments as changed conditions may demand.

That I understand to be a correct statement and exposition of the theory upon which the protective policy is based; and, however it might work out as a policy or, rather, as a theory, it is proper to say that that theory was advanced and the protective policy advocated thereunder at a time when the combinations of great industries in this country had not made it possible for the protective law to be used as a means by which competition could be absolutely defeated, not only the competition which should come from abroad, but competition which should be found among domestic producers themselves. So that it is a matter of the utmost importance for those who adhere to this policy and who stand upon this fundamental proposition which I have read, and which was thus announced by the senior Senator from Ohio, to examine carefully the schedules and to see whether or not, in the first place, the protective aid has been extended beyond the point where it is required for the fostering of these industries and to see more particularly whether that protective aid has been extended to a point where it is used for the oppression and extortion of the people by the entire prohibition of foreign competition and through combinations which absolutely destroy competition between producers in America.

Mr. President, on yesterday I called the attention of the Senate to particular instances where these protective rates are being used for the oppression of the people. I called attention to the case of those who manufacture steel rails, and I showed by the figures, by the estimates made by Mr. Schwab, that within six years, under the present schedule, there has been extorted from the people of the United States $150,000,000 over and above the amount which Mr. Schwab himself said would be a reasonable profit, and at which rate, he said, they could afford to sell their goods in foreign markets.

I have called attention to the particular instances of two railroads, one in my own State—the Macon, Dublin and Savannah—where a difference of $9 a ton was exacted from those who desired to extend the road—$9 a ton more than was offered to the same party, provided he would buy that railway iron to be used in the foreign country of Honduras.

I have called attention to the other case of the Mexican railroad, which was partly in Mexico and partly in Texas, and where, according to the statement of its president, the same manufacturer of steel rails at the same time asked of him $8 more for the rails he laid upon the part of his railroad in the State of Texas than he asked for the rails to be laid upon the same railroad where it extended into the country of Mexico.

I called attention also to the case where, upon reliable statements, it was shown that a party desiring three typewriters found that he could have those typewriters bought in the United States by a party in England; and he did have those typewriters bought and shipped to England and shipped back to him, paying freight both ways, and made money by the transaction.

I called attention to-day to the statement of the Philadelphia Press that butchers' meat could be bought very much more cheaply on the other side of our northern border than at points immediately opposite in the United States. In Buffalo the prices are from 25 to 50 per cent higher for butchers' meat than immediately across the line, in Fort Erie, and this is the testimony of the Philadelphia Press. I called attention yesterday and enumerated, and I will not repeat them——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the tariff on beef?

Mr. BACON. The tariff on beef is about 33 per cent. It is 2 cents a pound, which is about 33 per cent. If the Senator will allow me, that is on the wholesale price of the whole carcass. If the Senator will consult the price list, he will find that 2 cents a pound on beef is nearly, if not quite, 33 per cent of Chicago prices as quoted to-day. The price of the choice cuts at retail is of course several times as much as the price of the whole carcass at wholesale. Speaking in round numbers, it is about 33 per cent on beef, by reason of which fact, as stated by the Philadelphia Press, porterhouse steak is 24 cents at Buffalo and 16 cents at Fort Erie, right across the dividing line.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Twenty-four and 16?

Mr. BACON. Twenty-four and 16.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Surely the Senator does not think that that is the result of the 2 cents a pound tariff?

Mr. BACON. I will answer that in a moment, as soon as I get these other figures. That seems to be the highest priced beef—porterhouse steak. Loin steak is 15 cents at Buffalo and 12 cents at Fort Erie.

Now, I was about to say to the Senator that it is not simply a tax of about 33 per cent on beef, but we have a provision which absolutely prohibits the importation of beef or butchers' meat except where there may be a special permission by the Secretary of Agriculture. So the restriction is not confined to the tariff rate.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment—but whether the tariff is a sufficient explanation of the fact that there is this vast difference between the price of beef at Buffalo and at Fort Erie, within fifteen minutes' transportation, to what else can the Senator ascribe it?

Now I will yield to the Senator from Ohio, provided he desires to ask a question. I desire to say, and I say it in all courtesy and I know he will understand me, as I do not desire to be on the floor all the afternoon if I can avoid it, that if the Senator wishes to combat my proposition, I would rather he would do it in his own time.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not wish to combat it, but I rose simply to make an inquiry, whether the beef sold at Fort Erie—is that the name of the Canadian place?

Mr. BACON. That is the name of the Canadian place as given in the Philadelphia Press.

Mr. FORAKER. Is the beef sold in Fort Erie exported from the United States? Is it the same butcher who sells it?

Mr. BACON. I can not tell you anything about that.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator was speaking a minute ago about our products being sold cheaper abroad than at home. I only wanted to know whether this was another illustration of that?

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether that is true or not in this particular instance.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know.

Mr. BACON. I do say that, to my mind, it is absolutely beyond credibility that the difference in the price should be due to anything else but this very meat schedule.

Mr. President, yesterday I went through the figures to try to show what was the immense amount of money that the people of the United States are paying over and above a fair legitimate profit to the manufacturers of steel rails in this country, and I showed by the actual figures, if Mr. Schwab's statement is correct, that it amounted to over $150,000,000 on the figures as to the amount of rails of domestic manufacture which had been consumed in this country, and according to the excess in price over the price which Mr. Schwab himself said was a price at which they could profitably sell the rails in England.

But, now, if I were to attempt to calculate what has been the immense amount of money which has been thus contributed not only as to steel rails, but as to all other forms of steel, where would be the limit of the amount? If I were to go on and endeavor to show what has been the immense amount of money which has been taken from the consumers of this country, high and low, rich and poor, in butchers' meat, when, according to the testimony of this leading Republican newspaper, there is this vast difference between the price of meat in Buffalo and at Fort Erie, immediately across the line, what possible amount, unless I had the opportunity to come down to actual figures, could I conjecture which would be deemed reasonable?

Mr. President, what I am saying may be somewhat in the nature of repetition, but I am doing it for the purpose of making the application. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] in his speech at Akron—which, by the way, was a speech made on the same day as that made by his late lamented colleague when he advised the Republican party to "stand pat"—lays down the proposition as the recognized fundamental principle of the Republican party that it has always been a part of its policy to reduce high rates of duty deemed necessary to secure the establishment of an industry as rapidly as its development and the cheapening of its product might allow. If that is the correct principle of the Republican party, what answer has the Republican party to the inquiry whether or not under the present rates it does not devolve as a duty upon the Republican party at this time to reduce them?

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the Senator will find, if he will look at the record, that the Republican party has from time to time reduced the rates of duties imposed on imports that came into competition with domestic products. He is talking about steel rails. My recollection is that the first tariff duty on the importation of steel rails into this country was $28 a ton. After a time, after the industry was started here and the home competition had begun to have some effect, it was reduced to $17 a ton, I believe, and then from time to time it was reduced until to-day it is what?

Mr. BACON. Seven dollars and eighty-four cents, about, I think.

Mr. FORAKER. Say seven or eight dollars a ton. That is what I had in mind, and the history of tariff duties on steel rails is but an illustration of what is the history of the duty on imported products of every kind coming into competition with our products.

Mr. BACON. I trust the Senator will recognize the fact that I am not given to objecting to interruptions——

Mr. FORAKER. I know that.

Mr. BACON. And that it is only by reason of our conditions that I would not like to do more than to respond to inquiries, and I will be more than delighted, if the Senator can find the time, if he will respond in his own time to the suggestions I am submitting.

But, replying to what the Senator has just said, the Senator says that the duty on steel rails at one time was $28, and that gradually it has been reduced until it is now $7.84. Does that answer the proposition as to whether it should be still further reduced if it is demonstrated that at the present rate the people of this country are being oppressed by exorbitant prices?

I showed here yesterday by the letter of a president of a railroad that he was required to pay, for an extension to his railroad, $600 a mile more for the rails which he used upon that road than the price at which the same rails were offered to him if he would ship them to Honduras. Is that a case where the reply is to be made that while that is extortion, while it is an oppression, because of the fact that the duty was once higher and has been reduced in the past there should be a halt and no further reduction?

I will not stop to illustrate it by the matters which I have already gone over, but unless Senators can refute the propositions which I have endeavored to substantiate, that under the present tariff rates manufacturers are enabled to sell abroad at from 25 to 75 per cent less than they sell to our own consumers in the United States, is not the proposition presented whether or not the time has come when Congress should take hold of the question for the purpose of still further reducing the tariff rates?

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he has stated in the course of his remarks the aggregate amount that has been sold abroad at prices cheaper than similar articles of our own production have been sold at home?

Mr. BACON. I can not state the aggregate amount which has been so sold, but I have stated the particular concrete instances where these extortionate discriminations are made in favor of foreign customers and against purchasers in the United States, and before I get through, if time permits, I will allude to what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] stated as to the amount of foreign sales which are made by our domestic manufacturers.

Mr. FORAKER. I believe he stated it in his remarks a few days ago at only about $4,000,000 in the aggregate.

Mr. BACON. Four hundred million.

Mr. GALLINGER. Four hundred millions, and only four millions sold at a discount.

Mr. FORAKER. Four millions of it at a less price.

Mr. BACON. Only four million?

Mr. GALLINGER. Four millions sold at a discount below what similar goods were sold for in this country.

Mr. BACON. Now, where did the Senator get that information?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I got it from the report of the Industrial Commission. The Industrial Commission may have been wrong, of course.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly what we want to get at through this proposed investigation.

Mr. FORAKER. I have seen it repeatedly stated at less than 1 per cent of the aggregate exports.

Mr. BACON. That is what we want to get at by this amendment. We want to know definitely and authoritatively through the desired investigation what is the fact. But the fact, if it exists, that only a small proportion of American manufactured products are sold abroad at these low prices does not affect the argument. It is not the sale of American products to foreigners at low prices which hurts the American consumers, but it is the high prices which are exacted from the American consumers at home in the United States. It matters not practically to the American consumer whether the amount sold to foreigners at these low prices is great or small. The only purpose in showing the amounts sold to foreigners is to show by such transactions that they are not exceptional, but in the regular course of established business. If they can afford to sell to foreigners at these prices, it is an extortion when they sell to our own people at prices from 25 to 75 or 100 per cent greater.

I have stated these concrete instances where the particular oppressions are had. We are limited in our opportunities for ascertaining these matters, and we want to get information in a different way.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Georgia think the Department of Commerce and Labor has a right to make people tell the prices at which they sell goods abroad unless they see fit to do it?

Mr. BACON. That would be a matter for the consideration of the Senate as to whether it would excuse the Secretary of Commerce and Labor if he failed to get the information which we required of him. But there is no reason why he should not attempt it. He doubtless can secure the information if he desires to.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do you think he can require answers to questions at what prices they sell abroad?

Mr. BACON. Possibly not, although I am not sure but that he has the right under the law to bring parties before him. We have provided, and that was one of the main objects for the establishment of the Department of Commerce and Labor, that he might be in a position to gather information which would be of service to the legislative branch and to the executive branch and also to the judicial branch in the adjudication of these matters which are necessarily involved.

Mr. ALDRICH. I asked the question for the purpose of finding out what the Senator's view was as to the power of an executive officer of the Government to require answers to a question pertaining to the private business of an individual.

Mr. BACON. I do not think, in the absence of any direct law, he would have the right, of course, to require testimony. I have not the act before me. The Senator will remember that the purpose of the act was to enable the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to gather information. As I say, I have not the act before me, and I do not know to what extent he is empowered; but that undoubtedly was one of the principal objects of the creation of that Department, and it will be sufficient for us to meet that question when it is presented to us as a reason, if the Secretary shall fail to accomplish what we desire him to do. But it seems that that inquiry was not suggested to the mind of the Senator when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] offered his resolution. There was no objection to it, and there was no suggestion that the Secretary might not have the power to gather the information.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator on that line except to say that I supposed that the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, as well as the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, were introduced primarily with the view of enabling the authors of them to make speeches upon them.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. ALDRICH. I probably am.

Mr. BACON. And I hope that he will join with me in the effort to show that that is not my object. I desire that this information shall be had, and if the present suggestion of the Senator were correct, if that had been my purpose, I certainly would have then endeavored to have made a speech on it when I first introduced the resolution. I introduced the resolution hoping that we might get the information and that we might discuss it afterwards.

Mr. President, this matter is one which very largely and deeply concerns the American people. It is not a mere matter of politics. It is a matter which concerns the great masses of the people. It is a matter which is agitating the minds of many of the political party to which the honorable Senator from Rhode Island belongs and of which he is an honor, and I propose to read some things to show what is the position of many of his own party in this matter.

If Senators are prepared to say that they do not desire any change in the tariff; if they are prepared to say that they defend all the schedules of the present tariff; if they are prepared to go before the country and say they think no change should be made in the tariff, and that for that reason they have refused to make any changes during the last Congress and this session of the present Congress, then we will understand each other and the country will understand each of us. But what I desire is to bring the attention of the Senate squarely to the question whether or not they propose to stand by the present schedules or whether they propose to hold out the suggestion to the public that possibly they may not stand by them and they will change them in the future. I say that if the fact is ascertained; if it is properly brought to the attention of Congress that the schedules are wrong, that they are oppressive; that under them extortionate prices are exacted of the people, now is the time to legislate and not hereafter, and on that I propose to say something a little later, when I come more directly to it.

It is in that connection that I return to the extract I have read from the speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. I do not know that the Senator was here on yesterday, but I have endeavored to discuss this question from the standpoint of his utterance. I have said to the Senate that while there ought to be immediate correction of some of its abuses I was satisfied there could not be within the near future a change in the tariff which should provide any very great reduction in the general schedules of the tariff, because in the first place of the necessities of the Government, which require a very large revenue, and because the general business of the country had been very largely adjusted to high rates of tariff.

All of our standards of wages and prices of all kinds have been thus adjusted, and therefore no violent change could be safely made. But from that standpoint I was endeavoring to show to the Senate that there were schedules that were an abuse of this particular enunciation of the principles of the Republican party and of the protective policy as it had been always professed and advocated by those who were the great founders of the Republican policy.

On the same line of harmony with the tenets of the great founders of the protective policy I read an extract from a speech recently made by Representative LITTLEFIELD in his State of Maine, and which has been published in part in the newspapers. The extract is as follows:

> If upon investigation it turns out to be true that any product upon which there is a tariff is sold abroad cheaper than it is sold at home as the result of the operation on the tariff, the tariff upon such articles should be reduced to the extent that it is necessary to prevent that result, assuming, of course, that the relation of cause and effect can be established in connection with the situation.

In connection with this extract I quote the following from Representative BABCOCK, chairman of the Republican Congressional committee. In 1901 Mr. BABCOCK said, as reported in the public press:

> I maintain that it is part of the policy of protection to protect the consumer. * * *
>
> We can to-day produce and undersell the world. Shall we continue a tariff on articles that are in fact articles of export? If Congress maintains a tariff on such articles, the whole theory of protection falls to the ground, and it simply inures to the benefit of those who may secure the control of any such commodity, since by its aid they can fix exorbitant prices in the domestic market. How can such a policy be defended?

And again, February 4, 1902, Mr. BABCOCK said:

> From now on I am going to push the tariff plan at every possible opportunity. I am going to take advantage of every possible opening. The bill is going to be pressed every time the smallest chance offers, and I am not going to let anything go by.
> If the bill ever gets before the House, it will pass by three to one, and it will get before the House.

And that brings me directly again to the question whether or not the failure—and that is the crucial question—of the Republican party at this time, when it has the power to legislate and does not legislate, is to be taken as a statement to the American people that they do not think any legislation is required as to the present tariff schedules.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] says that he is in favor of revision, and that his party is in favor of a revision whenever circumstances require it. Does the Senator mean to say—and that is the point on which I desire that there shall be an enunciation to the American public—does the Republican party mean to say that, recognizing the fact that under proper circumstances there should be revision, there is now no such demand or requirement for revision? That is what we desire to have as a clean-cut issue. We do not desire that the Republican party shall say that there are schedules which should be revised and adjourn this session without attempting to do so, unless they can give a specific reason for their refusal now to do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator mean to inquire whether we think we ought to revise the tariff between now and Thursday at 12 o'clock, or at some other time?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, you are not obliged to adjourn on Thursday. If the people of the United States are resting under burdens from which they should be relieved, there is no reason why Congress should postpone that needed relief until next December.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think the Senate ought to originate a tariff measure?

Mr. BACON. I presume the Senator credits me with a knowledge of the law which requires such legislation to originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALDRICH. But my purpose in asking the question was to suggest to the Senator that the questions he is asking are rather impracticable in their nature.

Mr. BACON. They are not impracticable. I am speaking not simply of the Senate, I am speaking of the Republican party; I am speaking of Congress; I am addressing the Senate, and I am addressing the Senate composed of men who are in close touch with the leaders in the other House and who, if they thought there should be a revision, would very easily be in a position to have the measure originated where the Constitution requires it to be originated.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no desire to evade the question of the Senator from Georgia. I think it is perfectly well understood in the country that the party in power have had no desire or expectation of revising the tariff at the present session of Congress or attempting to do it, and that whatever may be the requirement of the future as to tariff revision there is a disposition and an announcement and an understanding that there is to be no agitation of the tariff question at this session.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. That is exactly what I am talking about. The Republicans have not done it, and they are preparing to adjourn without doing it. The question I am trying to direct attention to is as to whether or not there is a duty and obligation upon them to legislate on the abuses of the tariff, which duty they have failed and refused to perform.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think there is.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Then I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to say that he thinks the tariff schedules are right as they stand?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not by any means. That inference does not follow what I suggested.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean to say he does not think the tariff schedules are all right?

Mr. ALDRICH. That does not follow.

Mr. BACON. But I want to know what the Senator says. Are these schedules under which these abuses exist right or wrong?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say that the present tariff has been in existence for seven years, and it is utterly impossible for any tariff schedules to be constructed that will be properly adjusted at one time and that may not be in their nature either too high or too low seven years from that time.

Mr. BACON. Exactly.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are rates undoubtedly under the present tariff law which, if we were to take up the tariff for revision and reconstruction, would be changed, unquestionably.

Mr. BACON. Lowered?

Mr. ALDRICH. Some lowered and some raised, possibly.

Mr. BACON. In other words, the Senator thinks that the public interests of the country require a change in the present tariff schedules.

Mr. ALDRICH. That does not follow.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator please read in this connection the other clauses of my speech. As I recollect it——

Mr. BACON. I will read it.

Mr. FORAKER. That is the answer.

Mr. BACON. I do not think it answers it. The point I make is this: If the present schedule of the protective tariff contains particular rates under which oppressive and extortionate prices are exacted and collected from the people, then there is no excuse in the world why the people should be required to remain under those oppressive and extortionate rates one minute longer than the Republican party in power in all branches of the Government may have the opportunity and the power to change them and put them in a shape where they will not be thus oppressive and extortionate.

It is for that reason I endeavored to secure from the Senator from Rhode Island, who, as I said yesterday, is the mouthpiece of the Republican party, at least on the subject of tariff, in the Senate—everybody so recognizes him—a statement as to whether or not he, as the representative of that party, would say that the present tariff rates were right, and whether or not there were or were not any which ought to be changed in the interest of the people. If there are, I should like to know why there should be any delay on the part of the Republican party in proceeding to the performance of that public duty, unless it is the determination and purpose of the Republican party to stand pat on these extortionate schedules, and unless it is their purpose not to correct and change them at any time.

The Senator said it was well understood that there was to be no general legislation at this session. Of course it has been so understood, and that is the very subject of my present criticism. Before we assembled here in November the country was notified that the Senator from Rhode Island and four or five other Senators had proceeded to the summer home of the President and there had had a conference, and they came out and gave out to the press—at least the press published it as having been given out—that there was to be no tariff revision. Half a dozen Senators went there, and, with the Executive, determined the fact for Congress, and Congress has tamely submitted to their decision and has scrupulously carried out the programme thus marked out and prescribed for them. I have no doubt this system is to continue to grow and that more and more the Executive and a few leaders of his party will prescribe legislation which shall or shall not be enacted or undertaken.

If it be true that the public interest demanded general legislation, is it any excuse to say that none has been had because the Senator and four or five of his colleagues conferred with the President and determined that it should not be had? It was considerate in them to notify Congress of this decision before the beginning of the session.

What is the reason why we should not have legislation at this session of Congress? Is there any lack of time? Here we are, not yet May, and under the law we can sit until the first Monday in December. We are paid by the year. There is no additional expense to the Government in our remaining here. Certainly it is not for lack of time.

I have seen it suggested that there should be no legislation at this session of Congress because it is immediately preceding the Presidential election, and I have seen it further stated as the utterance of some Senators that it is better that there should be no legislation until after the people have instructed their representatives as to what they want. How are the people to instruct their representatives?

If there is no legislation during this session of Congress and the Republicans should prevail in November, they will take it as an approval of their failure to legislate, and therefore in the next session of Congress it will be said: "Why, the people have passed upon this thing. We did not legislate at the last session, and the people have reelected us, and therefore that is an approval of our not doing anything. It is a vindication of the 'stand-pat' policy. It is a verdict on the part of the people that the tariff schedules do not require any change, and therefore we will not proceed to make any change."

Mr. President, I have here an extract from the New York Commercial, published in November, 1902, after the election, in which it takes that very position. This was copied into the Washington Post of November 19, 1902, from the New York Commercial, in which it says:

> If the elections throughout the country on November 4 demonstrated any one thing clearly and emphatically, it was that the campaign cry for tariff revision and most of the talk in that direction that has intruded itself on public attention for a year past were prompted chiefly by free-trade influences, etc.

In other words, the very fact that Congress did not legislate in the Fifty-seventh Congress and that the Republicans were reelected in November, 1902, was taken as a vindication of the failure of Congress to legislate in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and so it will be in this case if the Republicans carry the November elections. If there is now no legislation, so far from the action of the people, in case the Republican party should prevail in the next election, being taken as an instruction to them to proceed to legislate upon the tariff, it will be taken as a vindication of the stand-pat policy and of their refusal to legislate.

Mr. President, it is said that legislation at this time is calculated to disturb business. Which will disturb business most, for this Congress to legislate, for this Congress to make the changes, if any, which are needed in the tariff schedules, and let the people when they go to the polls know what has already been done, or to have an election with an uncertainty as to what will be done?

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not present, unfortunately, at the latter part of the Senators' speech yesterday, and I should like to have him state to me, if he can briefly, what things he thinks ought to be changed. What rates ought to be changed? He was talking about steel rails when I left the Chamber yesterday, and I wondered whether there was any other article he thought ought to be changed.

Mr. BACON. I am sorry the Senator has not been here this afternoon, because I do not desire to repeat what I have said.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I do not ask the Senator to do that.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is chairman of the Finance Committee. He is informed as to the operation of the tariff schedules. He has made investigation of it and has opportunities for investigation which are so largely denied to many of us. No one is better informed than he on this subject.

Mr. ALDRICH. I can not understand that I have sources of information that are not open to the Senator from Georgia that I know of.

Mr. BACON. I will tell to the Senator, if he wishes me, some of the schedules which should be changed. I do not agree with the proposition that the tariff ought to be entirely repealed on all trust-made articles, nor is that the position of the Democratic party. There ought, however, to be changes in the schedules where they permit producers to sell to American consumers at a much higher rate than they sell to foreigners. I think the steel schedule should for one be changed. When, in the instances I have mentioned, the steel companies say that they will not sell to an American citizen steel rails within $8 of what they sell to a man who wants to build a railroad in Honduras, and when they are eager to sell to a man in Honduras, showing that they thereby make profit on it, I say that the exaction of $8 a ton more of the American consumer is not to be justified, and that it is the business of Congress to carefully investigate and see where the line is to be drawn. If the steel companies can sell profitably to the foreigner at $8 less than $28, he can afford to sell at the same price to the American consumer. Again, when the same steel producer sells to the Mexican National Railroad iron to go into Mexico at $20 a ton and asks $28 of the same corporation for steel to be laid on the part of the railroad that is in Texas, there is in such a transaction sufficient to challenge the attention of Congress and to demonstrate the fact that legislation is needed there to correct such power of extortion. Whether Mr. Schwab's figures are correct or not, I take the figures furnished by these two railroads, about which there can be no doubt. And, according to Mr. Schwab, what is true of the steel rail is also true of all the other steel industries.

In other words, that there is the same exorbitant excess over a reasonable profit exacted and collected from the American people, not only on steel rails, but upon the entire list of steel products. If so, all the steel schedules require revision, because they affect everybody in this country, for the reason that iron and steel have now become of universal use, and that no man escapes the tribute which these people, by reason of the excessive tariff schedules, are allowed and permitted to exact of them. It may be true, and, I hope, is true, that there are some steel producers who do not exact exorbitant prices for their goods sold in America, but the tariff schedules give them the power and opportunity to do so.

I went through the list yesterday, and I showed that almost every article of common manufacture, farming machinery, household utensils, sewing machines, typewriters, almost all the articles of common consumption, and all the articles used in common industries are under the present schedule sold, so far as we may have the information—not definite and conclusive, I grant you, but sufficient, certainly, to put Congress upon the duty of making further investigation and of proceeding to legislate—sold at prices from 20 to 75 per cent greater to the American people than the same articles are sold by the same person to people in foreign countries.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think taking the duties off agricultural implements would in any respect affect the question which he has referred to?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I am not sufficiently familiar with the foreign manufacturers to say with certainty, but I think there can be no question about the fact that the imposition of these duties is based upon the assumption that if by reason of those duties the domestic manufacturers were not permitted to have the home market they would be invaded by the foreign manufacturers, and if invaded by the foreign manufacturers it would be at prices much less than the prices which are now exacted, and on account of which the foreign manufacturer is entirely kept out of the market. The present rates could, however, be very materially reduced, and the American manufacturer would still control the American market.

Mr. ALDRICH. But suppose he was not only kept out of the foreign market, but out of the American market by the removal of the duty, does the Senator think——

Mr. BACON. That who would be kept out of the American market?

Mr. ALDRICH. The domestic producer, the manufacturer here. Do you think that would be a wise thing to do?

Mr. BACON. I do not; and I am not proposing that there should be any such extreme action. I am not advocating a repeal of the duties, but only their modification. I am simply limiting myself (which I think is a very conservative position for one to take who holds the economic views that I do) to the question as to whether, even under a protective tariff, there are schedules which are abusive of the protective principle, and which permit exorbitant and extortionate prices to be exacted from the people and collected from them in the sale of these goods.

Mr. President, I am told by Senators sitting around me that these farming implement manufacturers absolutely get out catalogues in which they show different prices for domestic consumers from those which they require from foreign consumers, and, as is stated to me by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], it can be charged with the utmost confidence that as to all farm implements, speaking generally, they are sold in foreign countries at much less than they are sold in this country, and that they are not sold as a mere matter of surplus, not sold for the purpose simply of introducing into another country, but they are sold because it is a profitable transaction to them; and as I endeavored to show, and did show by the letter, which I again read to-day, from Mr. Raoul, the president of the Mexican National Railroad, the trade for the Mexican part of his railroad at Mexican prices was so valuable to them and so valuable to others in that line of trade and there was such a competition to get his Mexican business that he could absolutely exact of them and did exact of them that they should sell to him on his Texas railroad at the same rate that they sold for the Mexican business.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. DIETRICH. If it is true that the manufacturers sell machinery in Europe at less than they do in the United States, provided they do not sell at less than cost in foreign countries, but sell at a profit in the United States, does not American labor receive a great benefit?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, in the first place——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me, since it is a cross fire, to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the American laborer who manufactures the foreign-sold article does not get precisely the same wages that he does when he manufactures the American-sold article for which our people are charged the higher price—manufactured in the same factory by the same laborers who receive precisely the same wages?

Mr. DIETRICH. I should like to have the Senator from Georgia answer my question. I ask him if the United States is not benefited from the fact that the machinery is manufactured here even though it be sold at cost abroad and sold at a profit in the United States?

Mr. BACON. In the first place, I do not admit and I do not credit that it is sold at cost in foreign countries. I have produced evidence here to the effect that it is not sold at cost in foreign countries, but sold at a profit. I do not know whether the Senator was in the Chamber yesterday or not, but I can not go all over that ground again. I gave figures. What I have just said about the Mexican National Railroad shows that it was a profit. I want to say to the Senator that the goods sold to the Mexican National Railroad for consumption in Mexico were not simply steel rails. They comprised all the articles which are bought by railroad companies in the prosecution of their business, everything relating to the construction and repair and to the equipment of a railroad, everthing relating to the management of a railroad, to its operation, and to its offices—iron safes, furniture, all the pharaphernalia, books, and everything else connected with the management and operation of a railroad.

Mr. DIETRICH rose.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will please wait a little while. I will let him in just as long as he wants, but I must finish what I am saying. This has been going on with this railway company for fifteen years. I stated the fact yesterday to the Senate that the way I happened to know about this was that I had been intimately associated with the president of that railroad, had been with him twice to Mexico over his own road, and had had conversations with him about this matter, and therefore when it came up, recollecting that, I wrote to him.

I will state to the Senator that the information which I had from him in this intercourse was as stated here in this letter, that as to all the articles, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, there were uniform prices of a difference of 25, or 30, or 40, or 50 per cent as to the same article to be used in Mexico on the same article to be used in Texas, a part of the railroad lying in Mexico and a part of it in Texas; and that the business of that railroad with the American manufacturers as to the products bought for Mexico at these reduced rates was so profitable, not sold at cost, but so profitable, and there was such competition among American producers to get the Mexican trade at the reduced rates, not at cost, but at profitable rates, that they absolutely, in order to get the trade in the competition between them and others, yielded the point and sold him for his Texas part of the railroad at the same reduced rates that were given on the Mexican part of the road. That does not look like selling at cost.

But, Mr. President, if the Senator were to go further and say it was sold at a loss instead of cost, it would still be an iniquitous oppression upon the American people. And why? Does anybody suppose that one of these manufacturers is engaged in business for pleasure, that they are indifferent to profit? Even if for the purpose of carrying on their business they are selling part of their goods in a foreign market at less than cost and thereby losing on it, does anybody doubt for a moment that the loss is made up out of the American consumer? Who would be so credulous as for a moment to think that every dollar that is lost by the selling of goods either at cost or below cost in a foreign market is not recouped by that much more charged and collected out of the domestic consumer?

Mr. ALDRICH. As I said, I was not here during the whole of the Senator's argument, and I would be glad to have him state whether he has advanced any other reason for tariff revision except the fact that certain manufacturers sell their goods at cost?

Mr. BACON. The Senator was not here at the time I read from the Washington Post's narration of what had been published by the Philadelphia Press, one of the leading Republican newspapers in the United States, the editor of which we all know, in which the Philadelphia Press called attention to the fact that by reason of the butchers' meat schedule meat was sold at a very much higher rate in Buffalo than it was immediately across the line in Fort Erie, and in order that the Senator may have the answer——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is on the same line I was asking, whether there is any other——

Mr. BACON. It is not on the same line——

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course it is.

Mr. BACON. Because I do not say it is sold by American butchers. I say it is not on the same line for that reason. I was calling attention to that as an additional reason why these schedules ought to be revised.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator means that the Canadian farmers get a less price for their beef than the American farmers?

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether they do or not, and for that reason I do not say that it is sold there by the American beef trust, but I do say that, by reason of the American tariff—if the Philadelphia Press is correct in its statement as to prices—the butcher's meat that people have to eat, and without which they can not live in health and comfort in this country, is sold from 25 to 50 per cent higher in Buffalo than for the same article across the river, twenty minutes away. And the same thing is doubtless true all along the Canadian border.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The tariff on beef in the United States is 2 cents a pound and in Canada 3 cents a pound. If this tariff of 2 cents is doing such infinite mischief here, what is the tariff in Canada doing?

Mr. BACON. I do not know anything about that; but I do know that it stands to reason, and any schoolboy can figure it out, that if we did not stand in Buffalo and say that we should pay 2 cents a pound on every pound of meat that came there, there certainly would be people enterprising enough, if they could make from 25 to 50 per cent on it, to bring it across and sell it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but what would become of the American industry?

Mr. BACON. The trouble about that, Mr. President, is—and I can not go into it at length, because there is a great deal of ground I want to cover, and we have got to get through before 6 o'clock—the trouble about that is that this tariff does not protect the man who raises the beef.

Mr. GALLINGER. It gives employment to American labor.

Mr. BACON. The man who raises beef does not get the benefit of it, but the beef trust gets the entire benefit, and the prices in Chicago prove that that is so.

A Senator who once sat here, and who is familiar with that business and himself a raiser of beef cattle—I refer to ex-Senator Harris, of Kansas—could, if now present, tell of the process by which the beef trust gets from the producer of the beef his meat at a very low rate and sells it to the consumer at a very high rate.

The consequence of it is that it is true, and every man within his own knowledge must testify to its truth, if not in his own experience, certainly in his observation, that the great mass of people who formerly ate butchers' meat every day in the year, and the best meat, too, now are able to eat it only occasionally, and then many of them are compelled to eat the cheaper classes of meat. Go out to-day in the city of Washington or anywhere else, and ask men of the mechanic and laboring classes whether or not I have stated the truth in that particular.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, I wish to ask him whether he is in favor of taking off the duty on live animals and dressed meats?

Mr. BACON. It ought certainly to be reduced.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator was discussing the concrete question, and that is a part of a concrete question.

Mr. BACON. In reply I say that under the present meat schedule there is great oppression of the people. I say that exorbitant prices are being exacted from them, and that as a consequence the great mass of the people now do not eat meat as they did formerly, and there ought to be a change of that schedule. It ought not to be allowed to remain as it is. It is the duty of the Senator, as chairman of the Finance Committee, and of his colleagues in the other House belonging to the dominant party, who have absolute control of this matter, to look into it and see what changes should be made.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Georgia has not yet answered my question.

Mr. BACON. I have answered the Senator's question. The Senator asked me whether or not I was in favor of taking off all the duty now laid on butchers' meat, and I said to him that I was not prepared to answer that question; that while there should be a reduction I did not know to what extent the reduction should go, not having looked into the details, but that the Senator and his party, in charge of legislation in Congress, should look into it and determine it, unless they are prepared to say it is all right as it stands. I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island, is it right as it stands?'

Mr. ALDRICH. The presumption is that it is right.

Mr. BACON. Very well; but do I understand the Senator to say that it is right?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the duties on live animals and dressed meats are all right.

Mr. BACON. I am very glad to get the Senator to that point.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to say to the Senator from Georgia that the present duties are entirely satisfactory to the cattle raisers and farmers of the West.

Mr. BACON. Well, I have not had that information. But how is it as to the consumer? How is it with the men who eat meat, or who would eat it, if they could afford to pay the present prices for it?

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me one word?

Mr. BACON. I will yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. STEWART. For a question?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator says that the high price of meat and the low price of cattle is due to the tariff. May it not be due to another cause, that of the cattle being nearly all killed in one place and carried over the country and placed in cold storage, which enables a few men killing all the beef to not only furnish the meat to the country, but to furnish a very bad class of meat? The tariff has nothing to do with this ptomaine meat which is poisoning people all over the country.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, the Senator will not, of course, expect me to go into that line now, I hope.

There is no limit to the range that this discussion could take, but I want to present some few things to the Senate before the time comes when I must conclude.

The conclusion to which this discussion brings me is that the Republican party does not recognize that any changes are required. Their refusal to attempt any changes shows that. If no changes are required, let me ask the Republican party when it goes into convention in June not to use ambiguous language, but, as they have now recognized that there are no such conditions as require changes, announce squarely a "stand-pat" policy, that they do not think there ought to be any change, and let the issue be squarely made before the country.

I will say, Mr. President, that interest in this matter has not been confined to one political party, but that it has been a general feeling throughout the country—not universal by any means, but still general—that there were oppressive schedules, under which certain combinations in this country were enabled to shelter themselves and thereby to oppress the people. That has been the Democratic idea for a long time, but still the Democrats have been in a minority and could not make themselves felt. But at last it seemed as if light was about to break when we had heard from the West the manifestation of the general unrest there was upon this subject.

The Republican party of the State of Iowa inaugurated a movement which at one time promised to work a reform inside of the Republican party. I am sorry to say that it has very largely disappeared and has been abandoned. But I want to read what the Republicans of Iowa said on this subject.

Mr. KEAN. When?

Mr. BACON. I think it was in 1902 or 1901, I have forgotten which. My distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] may tell us the exact date. It was when the celebrated Iowa platform was adopted, and I am not sure whether it was in 1901 or 1902. The Senator on my right can tell us when this important utterance was made that I am about to read.

Mr. DOLLIVER. There were two conventions.

Mr. BACON. I will say that I am reading this from a speech of Governor Cummins, in which he recites it. I have not the original platform before me, but I have the quotation from it made by Governor Cummins. He says in the course of his speech:

> Permit me to quote two succeeding sentences upon the same subject.

And here he quotes:

> We favor such changes in the tariff from time to time as become advisable through the progress of our industries and their changing relation to the commerce of the world. We indorse the policy of reciprocity as the natural complement of protection, and urge its development as necessary to the realization of our highest commercial possibilities.

There are two distinct propositions—first, as to changes; second, as to reciprocity—both of which, in the language of my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], have been absolutely abandoned by this Republican Congress.

Again:

We favor such amendments to the interstate-commerce act as will more fully carry out its prohibition of discrimination in rate making and any modification of the tariff schedules that may be required to prevent their affording shelter to monopoly.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator if the tariff schedules mentioned in the paragraph he has just read refer to railroad schedules or to Government schedules?

Mr. BACON. What is the question?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator referred to something in regard to interstate commerce, and I thought the article might have reference to railroad-tariff schedules. I may be wrong.

Mr. BACON. It says "tariff schedules."

Mr. LODGE. Does it not mean railroad-tariff schedules? The word is used in connection with railroads, as the Senator knows.

Mr. BACON. No; I should think not. That is not what it means.

Mr. LODGE. It is a curious connection in which to put it.

Mr. BACON. That is true, but still it is so.

Mr. LODGE. Government tariffs are not the only tariffs.

Mr. BACON. Railroads are not shelters for monopoly tariff rates.

Mr. LODGE. Where does the Senator live? They have been great shelters for monopolies for years.

Mr. BACON. Certainly; that may be true as to the rates furnished to certain customers, such as the Standard Oil Company, for instance. But the Senator and I have reference to different things. He has reference to the customers of railroads, while I have reference to the railroad companies themselves.

Mr. LODGE. They have generally been supposed to be the foundation for monopoly.

Mr. BACON. But when Governor Cummins uses the word "tariffs" he evidently refers to customs duties. What he says immediately thereafter conclusively proves that.

Mr. DOLLIVER. If my friend will permit me, I will say that a very long and somewhat acrimonious debate ensued in Iowa as to what was the meaning of those words, the Republicans, practically without dissent, disowning the proposition that the tariff was a shelter or protection for trusts, or in any sense the author of trusts; and owing to that ambiguity and discussion the party last year, by unanimous vote, abandoned the language.

Mr. BACON. Governor Cummins goes on, then, to defend the Republican party of Iowa from what he said was an unjust charge against them as to the construction of that language, and he uses this language:

It is the last phrase which, as I understand it, has excited comment throughout the length and breadth of the country. This phrase seems to me not only so plain and clear that it is incapable of being misunderstood, but also the statement of a self-evident truth in governmental policy. It has been accepted in some quarters as an assertion by the Republicans of Iowa that they favored the removal of tariff duties from all articles manufactured and sold by the so-called trusts. It requires a combination of gross ignorance and intense prejudice to give it such construction. The Republicans of Iowa understand the difference between all the products of combinations or trusts and the products in which there have been established monopolies, and their declaration is that tariff duties shall not be used to shelter a monopoly.

Certainly that did not refer to railroad tariffs in the opinion of Governor Cummins.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will say that the State of Iowa got a good deal of celebrity out of the language in that platform, but in reality it had been a very common expression in Republican platforms throughout the country and, in the form in which the Republicans of Iowa, as a rule, interpreted it, was copied substantially from the Republican national platform of 1896.

Mr. BACON. Right in that connection Governor Cummins says this:

I have heard it said that in this respect our platform occupies Democratic ground. If this were so, and it is righteous ground, I would not therefore abandon it. From the bottom of my heart I wish that the two parties did occupy common territory upon this great field, for the problems that are to be solved should not be vexed with partisan dispute. Unfortunately, however, it is not true that we have met upon friendly ground.

Now it is, Mr. President, that the Democrats are those who desire that there shall be action upon this ground, and the Republicans have turned their backs upon it and repudiated it.

The first intimation that we had that the Iowa Republicans were not going to stand upon that platform was in a speech made at Marshalltown, Iowa, by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], than whom there is no man held in higher, if so high, esteem in this Senate. My distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] is doubtless entirely familiar with that speech; but I will read an extract from it as showing the first intimation we had that the Iowa idea was about to be abandoned. In the course of that speech the distinguished senior Senator from Iowa said this:

The tariff plank in our State platform is not a declaration in favor of tariff revision, nor is it a declaration against tariff revision.

Our political enemies demand a defense of the details of present tariff laws, and they charge us with standing pledged to the maintenance of existing rates. This is not the Republican position, and so to officially answer the charge it is eminently proper to make the declaration contained in the Iowa platform.

* * * * * * * *

If the State convention of Iowa should declare specifically for tariff revision, or for any specific remedy for trusts, I doubt not the Iowa delegation would be very prompt to heed, and certainly the Iowa members of the Cabinet will bring the subject to the careful attention of the President.

After that very definite and unambiguous expression of opinion on the part of the senior Senator from Iowa concerning the purposes of the Iowa Republicans, we were naturally all filled with apprehension that the reform which we thought the Iowa Republicans were about to introduce in their party, and which we hoped would be spread and be adopted by other Republicans all over the United States, was about to be abandoned; and, sure enough, when the convention met there was a very remarkable utterance upon the subject of the tariff. When it came to the question as to what enunciation should be made as to the tariff in the Iowa platform, we have this very definite one:

Duties that are too low should be increased, and duties that are too high should be reduced.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the Senator from Georgia dispute either of those propositions?

Mr. BACON. I do not. I think that is a self-evident truth that nobody could possibly dispute and one of the most catholic utterances which I have ever heard, upon which everybody can stand. If a man was dissatisfied with the schedules, he would say, of course, "They ought to be reduced and will be reduced; therefore I will stand by the Republican party;" and if he were satisfied with the schedules, he would say, of course, "They are not too high, and they will not be reduced, and therefore I will stand by the Republican party." That made everything lovely in the Republican party in Iowa.

A popular writer, Mr. President, has compared that plank in the Iowa platform to one of the utterances of famous Jack Bunsby, the oracular seafaring man of Dombey and Son. After the Son and Heir—the name of the ship that carried Walter to far-away seas—had sailed, and a long time had passed and no news could be gathered of it and it was feared the ship was lost, our dear old friend Captain Cuttle went with Florence to consult Jack Bunsby as to whether he thought the Son and Heir had gone down and Walter had been lost. The oracular response of Jack Bunsby was this: "If so be he is dead, my opinion is that he will not come back any more; if so be he is alive, my opinion is he will. Do I say he will? No."

Mr. President, I have here a cartoon, made by the young genius Berryman, which, if I were to follow the example of our distinguished friend from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] in endeavoring to convert the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD into a pictorial daily, I might ask the privilege of introducing but for the fact that the likenesses in it are too correct and it would be entirely too personal to do so. But I will say that, as the result of this convention in which this oracular announcement of the position of the Republicans of Iowa was made, it represents the animal which is recognized as the emblem of the "grand old party"—the elephant—and by his side, leading him and marching with him, a very prominent Republican who was supposed to have been influential in the phrasing of that utterance by the Iowa Republican convention. On the rump of the animal, facing to the rear, is another very prominent Iowa Republican, with a muzzle on and bound hand and foot and placarded "You can't lose A. B.," and underneath the cartoon is written "We are all in line." And so they were, but facing in opposite directions.

We all know, Mr. President, that in mediæval times those in authority were not very particular as to the methods by which they secured their plunder out of the common people. I use the word "plunder," but I am not using it offensively as to the tariff, although it might be quite proper to be done in some cases. But I never realized the fact that the scientific method of getting plunder out of the people without their exactly knowing how it was done, as is accomplished through means of the protective tariff, was of ancient origin. But it is proved to be by one of the utterances of the noble Brutus, which I shall read, and which I can not imagine could ever have been put into his mouth by the author of Julius Cæsar unless he had himself known something about the protective tariff. In the celebrated controversy between

Brutus and Cassius, Brutus, in a rage of indignation, uses these words:

> By heaven, I had rather coin my heart,
> And drop my blood for drachmas, than to wring
> From the hard hands of peasants their vile trash
> By any indirection.

I am utterly unable, Mr. President, to understand how even so great an intellect as the author of Julius Cæsar should have ever found such language unless he knew something practically, and a great deal, about the operations of a protective tariff.

ADDITIONAL HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3165) providing for second and additional homestead entries, and for other purposes; which was on page 1, lines 3 and 4, to strike out the words "or who may hereafter make."

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that this bill has met the approval of the Department. It allows homesteaders who have failed to secure their homesteads and who have sufficient proof that such failure has been through no fault on their part to make a second entry. It only applies to past homesteading and not to future homesteading.

I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The bill (H. R. 11586) to permit the construction of a smelter on the Colville Indian Reservation, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that bill has been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that they have practically agreed to a similar Senate bill. So I wish this bill might lie on the table until to-morrow, when, if I find such to be the case, I shall ask to have the bill called up, and put on its second reading, and also on its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW TOWN-SITE FUND.

The bill (H. R. 12382) authorizing the payment of the Choctaw and Chickasaw town-site fund, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. With reference to this House bill the Committee on Indian Affairs have heretofore reported a Senate bill, which I have compared with the House bill, and the two bills are in identically the same language, including the amendments which the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs recommended. If there be no objection, I will, therefore, ask that the House bill shall be considered and put on its passage at the present time.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I, of course, would not want to object, but I simply desire to express the hope that the bill is so drawn as to enable those Indians to take care of certain warrants which have been long since past due and which were issued in payment, as I understand, for the services of their school-teachers. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut if this bill will permit the application of a part of this money to that purpose?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. This bill provides that the accumulated town-site fund shall be paid to the Choctaws per capita.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, of course, Mr. President, it would not permit the application of it to a tribal obligation.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I suppose not.

Mr. BAILEY. I regret that this money is not to be devoted to discharging an obligation of the tribe before being divided among the tribesmen. I have constituents who for two years have been carrying the school warrants issued by the Chickasaw government in discharge of its obligations to its school-teachers, and I am advised by those constituents that the Choctaw legislature has recently passed, and the governor of the Choctaw people has approved, a bill to pay these warrants, and that they only need either the Federal Government to advance to them the funds out of what it now holds for their account, or else to authorize them in some way to make the provision. I desire to protest against the division of this fund among those people individually while their obligations as a government are going unpaid amongst my constituents.

As the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Nevada, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, will recall, I did appear before that committee and urge that some provision be made for the payment of those warrants.

I not only feel that as a matter of justice to my constituents it ought to be done, but I feel that as a matter of justice to the good name of the Indians, whose tribal relation is soon to be dissolved, they ought not to be left with any obligation unprovided for, and particularly they ought not to be left with an obligation which represents the labor of American citizens in teaching their children.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator objects to the passage of this bill, all I will ask at the present time is that the House bill may be substituted on the Calendar for the Senate bill which has already been reported and is now upon the Calendar.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no desire to interfere with the Committee on Indian Affairs, but if taking that course will afford us some opportunity to provide by amendment for these warrants, I shall be gratified to see it taken.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the House bill be substituted on the Calendar for the Senate bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered, and the bill (S. 4657) authorizing the payment of the Choctaw and Chickasaw town-site fund will be indefinitely postponed.

COAL CITY (ILL.) PORT OF DELIVERY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 12899) constituting Coal City, Ill., a port of delivery, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Nobody objects to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Committee on Commerce have examined the bill and favor its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CARNEGIE INSTITUTION OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14093) to incorporate the Carnegie Institution of Washington. The bill was read the other day and was objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who now withdraws his objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was read in full the other day. The amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

The first amendment was, on page 1, section 1, line 4, before the word "Carnegie," to strike out "said;" in line 5, before the name "Dodge," to strike out the letter "E" and insert the letter "H;" in line 8, after the name "Hutchinson," to insert "Samuel P. Langley;" and in line 10, after the name "Morrow," to insert "Ethan A. Hitchcock;" so as to make the section read:

PRESERVATION OF HISTORIC AND PREHISTORIC RUINS, ETC.

Mr. TELLER. Day before yesterday I objected to the passage of a bill in which the scientists of this country are greatly interested. There were some objections that I had to the bill. After consulting with them I prepared yesterday, with their approval, an amendment which I ask to substitute for the bill, and that the bill be put on its passage.

I desire to call up the bill this morning, for there has been a great deal of interest taken in it by the scientific people of the country, and inasmuch as I objected to the bill I feel that I ought to do so. I offer an amendment which is agreeable to the parties interested in securing a measure for this purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.
